

THE GENERAL
HISTORY of the Late WAR:

CONTAINING ITS

Rise, Progress, and Event,

IN EUROPE, ASIA, AFRICA, and AMERICA.

AND EXHIBITING

The STATES of the Belligerent Powers, at the Commencement of the War; their Interests and Objects in it's Continuation; and REMARKS on the Measures, which led GREAT BRITAIN to Victory and Conquest.

INTERSPERSED WITH

THE CHARACTER of the able and disinterested STATESMEN, to whose Wisdom and Integrity, and of the HEROES, to whose Courage and Conduct, we are indebted for that

NAVAL and MILITARY

Success, which cannot be equalled in the Annals of this, or of any other Nation.

AND WITH

Accurate Descriptions of the SEAT of WAR, the Nature and Importance of our CONQUESTS, and of the most remarkable BATTLES by Sea and Land.

Illustrated with

A Variety of HEADS, PLANS, MAPS, and CHARTS, Designed and Engraved by the best Artists.

V O L. III.

Historici op: nequid falsi, audet dicere: nequid veri, non audet. POLIB.

By the Rev. JOHN ENTICK, M.A.
And other GENTLEMEN.

THE FOURTH EDITION CORRECTED.

L O N D O N:

Printed for EDWARD and CHARLES DILLY, in the Poultry.

MDCCLXXXIX.

3

THE GENERAL
HISTORY of the Late WAR:

CONTAINING THE

Peace, Progress, and Events,

Between, ASIA, AFRICA, and AMERICA.

AND THE HISTORY OF

THE STATE OF THE WORLD, FROM THE BEGINNING OF THE PRESENT CENTURY, TO THE PRESENT TIME, IN THE YEAR 1763, WHICH IS THE YEAR OF THE END OF THE WAR.

THE HISTORY OF THE
WAR, FROM THE BEGINNING OF THE PRESENT CENTURY, TO THE
PRESENT TIME, IN THE YEAR 1763, WHICH IS THE YEAR OF THE
END OF THE WAR.

THE HISTORY OF THE
WAR, FROM THE BEGINNING OF THE PRESENT CENTURY, TO THE
PRESENT TIME, IN THE YEAR 1763, WHICH IS THE YEAR OF THE
END OF THE WAR.

THE HISTORY OF THE
WAR, FROM THE BEGINNING OF THE PRESENT CENTURY, TO THE
PRESENT TIME, IN THE YEAR 1763, WHICH IS THE YEAR OF THE
END OF THE WAR.

THE HISTORY OF THE
WAR, FROM THE BEGINNING OF THE PRESENT CENTURY, TO THE
PRESENT TIME, IN THE YEAR 1763, WHICH IS THE YEAR OF THE
END OF THE WAR.

THE HISTORY OF THE
WAR, FROM THE BEGINNING OF THE PRESENT CENTURY, TO THE
PRESENT TIME, IN THE YEAR 1763, WHICH IS THE YEAR OF THE
END OF THE WAR.

THE HISTORY OF THE
WAR, FROM THE BEGINNING OF THE PRESENT CENTURY, TO THE
PRESENT TIME, IN THE YEAR 1763, WHICH IS THE YEAR OF THE
END OF THE WAR.

THE HISTORY OF THE
WAR, FROM THE BEGINNING OF THE PRESENT CENTURY, TO THE
PRESENT TIME, IN THE YEAR 1763, WHICH IS THE YEAR OF THE
END OF THE WAR.

THE HISTORY OF THE
WAR, FROM THE BEGINNING OF THE PRESENT CENTURY, TO THE
PRESENT TIME, IN THE YEAR 1763, WHICH IS THE YEAR OF THE
END OF THE WAR.

THE HISTORY OF THE
WAR, FROM THE BEGINNING OF THE PRESENT CENTURY, TO THE
PRESENT TIME, IN THE YEAR 1763, WHICH IS THE YEAR OF THE
END OF THE WAR.

THE HISTORY OF THE
WAR, FROM THE BEGINNING OF THE PRESENT CENTURY, TO THE
PRESENT TIME, IN THE YEAR 1763, WHICH IS THE YEAR OF THE
END OF THE WAR.

THE HISTORY OF THE
WAR, FROM THE BEGINNING OF THE PRESENT CENTURY, TO THE
PRESENT TIME, IN THE YEAR 1763, WHICH IS THE YEAR OF THE
END OF THE WAR.

THE HISTORY OF THE
WAR, FROM THE BEGINNING OF THE PRESENT CENTURY, TO THE
PRESENT TIME, IN THE YEAR 1763, WHICH IS THE YEAR OF THE
END OF THE WAR.

THE HISTORY OF THE
WAR, FROM THE BEGINNING OF THE PRESENT CENTURY, TO THE
PRESENT TIME, IN THE YEAR 1763, WHICH IS THE YEAR OF THE END OF THE WAR.

LONDON:
Printed for J. BARNARD and CHARLES DILLY, in the Strand.
MDCCLXXIX.

THE GENERAL HISTORY
OF THE
LATE WAR.

THE Imperial army being utterly disabled by the defeat at Rosbach; and there being nothing to fear, nor to do in this quarter, his Prussian Majesty was left entirely at liberty to act in person against the Austrians. They had opened trenches before Schweidnitz, in Silesia, on the 26th of October, but had made little or no progress on the 9th of November, having been perpetually interrupted by the frequent sallies of the besieged. Prince Charles of Lorraine had encamped near Breslau, over-against the army commanded to cover that city, under the Prince of Bevern, waiting the reduction of Schweidnitz, that he might be able, by the addition of the forces employed in that

A. D.
1757
King of Prussia
turns his thoughts against the Austrians
in Silesia.

The troops of Bavaria and Wurttemberg.

A. D.
1757.

of the war between him and the Empress Queen. His Majesty, therefore, hastened to its assistance with a considerable part of his victorious army, firmly believing that the garrison would hold out, with hopes of relief, to the last extremity. But it was too late. For, though there was great encouragement to hold out, from the great loss sustained by the Austrians, in a general assault, on the eleventh, when they could only carry two redoubts, without making any considerable breach in the ramparts of the town, the generals, who commanded at Schweidnitz, thought proper against the instigation of the garrison, who had, before, resolved to force their way through the besiegers, to capitulate next day; and so they surrendered themselves and a garrison of good brave fellows prisoners of war, and that important fortress into the hands of the Austrian auxiliaries, together with a great quantity of ammunition, provisions and money.

The generals
of the Austrian
army
made
the garrison
of Schweid-
nitz.

The loss of this strong town was certainly a very great weakening of his Prussian Majesty's interest and strength in Silesia; but the depriving him of the service of so many veteran soldiers would have been more severely felt in his present circumstances, had they not found an opportunity to disengage themselves from the escort, conducting them into Bohemia; which the garrison of Schweidnitz were animated to do by the news of the

The soldiers made prisoners,
by from their escort

the

the achievements of their fellow soldiers, under the command of their King in person, at Roßbach. So the got above 200 of their prisoners retained with the Austrians.

Schweidnitz, having surrendered, the corps, which had besieged it, rejoined the main army near Lissa. Where it was resolved to attack the Prince of Bevern without delay, before the King, by forced marches, could arrive to his assistance. Their force was three times more than the Prince's: and General Nadaſti was posted with a separate body on the flank of the Prussian right wing.

The attack was begun at nine o'clock on the 22d in the morning. But notwithstanding their vast superiority in numbers, and the advantage of their situation, the Austrian right wing was entirely beat and forced to retire towards Neumarch.

Lieutenant General Zieten, who commanded the Prussian left wing, gave Nadaſti such a warm reception, that his separate corps was also routed; and the enemy began every where to give up the battle for lost, and to consult how they might make a safe retreat; and left the Prussians in possession of the field of battle. But the Prince of Bevern finding that some of his regiments had suffered greatly, did not think it proper to remain in that situation. He first withdrew into his camp, and next night he passed the Oder near Brossen; a retreat equally as mysterious as the surrender of Schweidnitz; for according to the best accounts, his army was far from being weakened in propor-

A.D. 1717.

The Austrians re-join the main army at Lissa.

Attack the Prince of Bevern.

Princes of Bevern
retires.

Had lost 8000 men in the battle.

A. D. 1757. tion to the Austrians, who, it is said, amounted to 20,000 men killed, wounded and missing.

Surprised and taken prisoner.

On the 23d the army remained behind Breslau: and on the 24th, about four in the morning, the Prince of Bevern, as he was reconnoitring with an escort, was surprized and carried off by a party of Croats, who had passed the Oder, under the command of General Beck. This misfortune did not come alone. Lieutenant General Lestwitz, the chief commander in Breslau, giving up all hopes of support from an army, that knew not how to improve the advantage of their late victory, and was now deprived of their commander, in a very mysterious manner, and thinking his own strength was very insufficient to maintain a place so extensive and so badly fortified, capitulated, on condition that the garrison and wounded should have free leave to march out, and not act against the Empress Queen during the course of the war.

All communication between the King of Prussia and his army in Silesia cut off.

Such was the situation of his Prussian Majesty, all communication between him and his armies in Silesia being cut off by the enemy, that he could have no advice of these transactions, till the 29th, when he arrived at Parchwitz. Here he assembled his whole strength; the resolute garrison of Schweidnitz, that broke from their escort, and the forces, that had done such great things under the Prince of Bevern, and Lieutenant General Ziethen. And by this junction, his Majesty, on the first of December, found himself in a condition to face the enemy, and his troops full of ardour to restore affairs to their former state.

Thus disposed and animated, his Prussian Majesty, being but two days march distant from the enemy, advanced with his whole army to Neumarch, on the 4th. The visit was quite unexpected. It threw the hussars and pandours, many thousands of which were resting themselves secure in that town, into great confusion, at the approach of the King's army. They endeavoured to escape towards Breslau, while they shut the gates of the town on the side of the Prussians. But his Prussian Majesty foreseeing that would be their attempt to escape, had ordered some squadrons of dragoons and hussars to file round the walls, and to cut off their retreat. By this means the action became desperate. The Prussians forced the gates and drove the enemy entirely out of the town: who falling into the hands of a large body of cavalry, stationed for that purpose, 300 of them were cut to pieces, and 600 threw down their arms and were made prisoners, with the loss of no more than five Prussian hussars. There were found in this town all the enemy's ordnance, a small magazine, and two pieces of cannon, belonging to the pandours.

The Austrian army, upon the news of this insult, demolished the entrenchments of their camp near Lissa, recalled all their straggling parties, and all the garrison of Breslau, except a few battalions, in order to seek the King of Prussia, and to chastise him for his presumption to come and beat up their quarters. But as soon as his Majesty was informed of their motions and design,

A. D. 1757.

Marches in quest of the Prussian army.

Surprises Neumarch

which he and his army did

Loss of the Austrians.

The Austrian army did not march to give him battle.

THE GENERAL HISTORY OF

A.D. 1757
King of Prussia advances to meet them.

Drives their advanced guard back.

Disposition and strength of the Austrian camp.

he, to save some trouble and time, resolved to meet the enemy: and at five o'clock next morning (the 9th) he began to march with his whole army. On the day before the Austrian cavalry were defeated on a hill, about half a league from Neuhauſen who spread themselves so much, that they carried the appearance of the whole Austrian army: by that draw of light: and accordingly the King commanded his troops to march forward in two columns. As the day advanced, it was soon discovered that these troops, which occupied the hills, were only four regiments of Saxon light horse, under the command of Lieutenant General Count Mollat. The Prussian hussars were immediately ordered to attack them: which they performed so furiously, that they killed and took about 300 and put the rest to flight: who escaped under the protection of a thick fog: a circumstance that also greatly favoured the march of the Prussians, as they proceeded: for they were upon the main body of the Austrian army about noon, under this cover, before they were apprised of their intentions. The Austrians were drawn up in order of battle, in front of the village of Leuthen, upon a fine plain, with some adjacent eminences well furnished with artillery, fortified both on the right and the left by strong batteries of cannon, and in the intervals made difficult of access by trees felled and laid cross the way, where the thickets did not favour their operations and dispositions. Moreover their left wing was well covered behind by a pretty large large wood, where the enemy had cut down a great number of trees, to prevent their being attacked in flank. However, after his Prussian Majesty had reconnoitred their situation, he resolved to attack their left wing, and made his dispositions accordingly; and as General Nadasti was posted with the corps of reserve on the left wing, in order to fall upon the flank of the right wing of the Prussians, his Majesty placed four battalions behind the cavalry of this same wing, which had a very good effect: for, these same battalions not only routed Nadasti's corps, which, at the beginning of the action flanked the Prussian cavalry in the right wing, and had made them give way, but supported and covered the right wing so effectually, that they acted with such vigour on the left of the enemy, as to oblige them soon after to fall back. This made way for the Prussian infantry to advance; which they did in good order, though exposed on all sides to a fierce fire of artillery and small arms; of which the like was scarce ever seen. But the Prussian artillery performed wonders on this occasion. It was of such signal service in supporting the march of the infantry, that the enemy's cannon were soon silenced.

Nothing could excel the bravery and gallant resistance made by the Austrians during the whole engagement. But, they were at length, though with great difficulty, obliged to give way. They rallied all their forces about Leuthen, which was defended on all sides by entrenchments and redoubts; and maintained the battle at this place about

A. D.

1757

Attacked

by the Prussians.

troves

sh to amillu

muse

muse

muse

muse

muse

muse

muse

muse

muse

muse

muse

muse

muse

muse

muse

muse

muse

muse

muse

muse

muse

muse

muse

muse

muse

muse

muse

muse

muse

muse

muse

muse

muse

muse

muse

muse

muse

muse

muse

muse

muse

muse

muse

muse

muse

muse

muse

A. D.
1757.

Victory
declared in favour
of the Prussians.

Pursuit.

Length of the engagement.

about an hour longer; but were at length forced to yield to fate and to the superior bravery of the Prussian battalions, who repeated their attacks till they became masters of this post. This decided the battle. The Austrians beaten from their last resort fled on every side: and when the village of Leuthen was abandoned, his Prussian Majesty met with no further opposition. Victory having thus declared in favour of the Prussians, the pursuit begun. The cavalry and hussars pursued the flying enemy most part of the night: killed many, and brought in many thousand prisoners. The King, on his side, pursued the enemy as far as Lissa, where his army spent the night under arms.

Great generalship and remarkable bravery were shewn on both sides in this battle, which accounts for the length of the contest, and for the extraordinary loss of men. The battle began at two in the afternoon and continued till night. But the line formed by the Austrians was so extensive, that they could quickly replace with fresh troops the loss they sustained. This prevented the Prussian right wing's being employed at the beginning of the action: and this was the reason why the battle did not become general till towards four o'clock, and of being obliged to bring up their small rear-guard. Besides the cavalry at first found it very difficult to engage, being obliged to advance over causeways and felled trees, with which the enemy was covered. But General Zieten, their commander, delivered them at length out of that difficulty, and found them a way to come into a share of the action; and then they drove all before them.

The

The right wing of the Prussian army was commanded by his Majesty in person, and conducted by Prince Maurice of Anhalt-Dessau. The left was committed to the conduct of General Retzow. The whole dispositions were made by his Prussian Majesty, and surpassed every thing he had yet done: and they were as happily executed; otherwise the infantry, which performed wonders, must have been obliged to give way in their Sovereign's presence.

A. D.
1757.

Gallant
action of
a cornet.

The confusion of the Austrians became so great that, in the pursuit, a cornet of Zieten's regiment, with a party of ten men only, took, disarmed, and brought 100 Austrians prisoners to the head quarters. For which gallant action, the King promoted him to the rank of a captain, and honoured him with the order of merit.

Gallant
action of
a cornet.

Rewarded,
by the King.

The Austrian army was not only well officered, but it was vastly superior in numbers and strength, consisting of 80,000 men, and a very large train of artillery. The Prussians did not exceed 36,000 horse and foot; with a much inferior artillery. The Austrians had 6000, and upwards slain in battle: had many more wounded: 21,500 were made prisoners, amongst whom were two generals, General O'Donnel dangerously wounded, the Saxon General Count de Nostitz: besides the son of the late Marshal Browne; and 291 officers, many of them field officers: they lost 4000 baggage and ammunition waggons, well filled; 160 cannon; and 31 colours and standards.

Strength
of the Austrian
army.

Of the Prussians.

Loss of the Austrians.

* Some accounts make them 200 and 241 pieces.

Prince

A.D.
1757.Surprising disparity.

Prince de Lichenstein was also dangerously wounded; and General Count Luchow was killed in the field of battle.

What exceeds almost all credulity is, the small loss of the Prussians on this memorable and most severe occasion; they had no more than 500 killed and 2,300 wounded; amongst whom was Major General Knechtow, who was also much wounded. But the account from Vienna of the same action is so flagrant an instance of misrepresentation, that we cannot but take particular notice of it: this account was contained in a dispatch bearing date the 14th of December, and directed to the ministers of their Imperial Majesty at foreign courts. The substance of which is as follows:

Austrian
account.

"Y^{OU} have had, as yet, Sir, but a very imperfect account of the affair on the 5th of December, between the Imperial and Prussian army. As I am persuaded the Prussians will make great boast, and magnify to an extreme degree, their victory over the Austrians, I am glad I have it in my power to assure you, that except the apparent advantage of having kept the field of battle, and having taken eighteen or twenty field pieces, they obtained none that were any way essential. The consequences of this action will place themselves in a clear light.

"The effusion of blood was, indeed, very great; but, I believe, the result will prove more in the advantage of the Imperial than the Prussian army, by reason, that the loss was near equal."

This battle was fought on the 5th of December 1757.

and that, if there was a difference with regard to the number of the slain and wounded, it seems to me, that it was in favour of the Imperialists. The Russians will not gain an inch of ground by this event. They will be obliged to fight a new, which will only, in the end, weaken them; or they must seek out for winter quarters.

Breslau and Leignitz are provided with strong garrisons, and with provisions and ammunition in abundance. The Imperial army, by its position near Schweidnitz, covers that place, secures the communication with Bohemia, and so keeps in awe the Prussian army, that it cannot execute any thing against these two places, otherwise than by sending them to surrender: for to effect any thing else, there would be a necessity of investing and besieging them in form. This is what the King of Prussia is not likely to attempt: he has an army, which, whatever reinforcement this Prince may receive, will also be reinforced on its side, and will always be superior in number to him; and I dare say, will not fail to equal him in courage. But now I will lay before you a clear and distinct idea of the action of the 5th.

It is expedient previously to observe, that it were to be wished, that after the taking of Breslau, the Imperial army had been in a condition to pursue the broken remains of Prince Bevern's army, to beat or disperse them, and at the same time to march against the King of Prussia, who came to cover a retreat; but the necessary celerity in such a case was not practicable. The Imperial army had suffered much in the action of the 22d of November.

A. D.
1757.

November. The infantry wanted shoes and stockings, which they were under a necessity of being furnished with, before they could set out on their march. The cavalry extremely fatigued, had occasion for rest to recruit their spirits, and it was not till the fourth of this month, that they were in a condition to march against the enemy.

"This interval of time, which the King of Prussia gained, a time always precious in war, facilitated the assembling of the troops dispersed by the action of the 22d of November, together with the arrival of the numerous garrison of Glasgow, and a part of the heavy artillery of that place; as also a considerable detachment, as it is pretended, from Marshal Lichwald's army: so that by a moderate computation, this Prince's troops might be supposed to amount to 36 or 40,000 men, on the day of battle.

"The Austrians had in all 50,000 men. They might have insured the victory, if they had had 10,000 less. This can be easily proved. Their army was posted very advantageously by the care and attention of Marshal Daun. The right, extended to the village of Nypern, was covered by ponds. The front was secured by its situation and a numerous artillery, and the left terminated in a village called Leuthen. This village being situated in a plain, Marshal Daun, who foresaw that the King of Prussia would direct his main attack on this point, had reinforced it, and covered the flank by five lines disposed behind each other, thus making, like an experienced general, the best advantage of the nature of the ground. It was in the situation that the Austrian generals waited the coming up of the enemy. The Prussians advanced about one in the afternoon, within cannon shot. The Austrian artillery did such execution, that it immediately threw into confusion the first line of the enemy's infantry, which, with great difficulty was brought again to the charge. Towards three o'clock the fire of the small arms began. The two lines having closed each other, that of the Prussians was every where repulsed, except in the above-mentioned point of attack, where the troops posted on the left, at the first discharge of the Prussian infantry gave way, without firing a shot, turned their backs, and brought after them, in their flight, some troops, and even intire regiments that flanked them. This unforeseen and unexpected accident broke the line, and gave opportunity to the Prussian cavalry to penetrate into the empty space. The disorder was afterwards, in some respect, rectified, and the line being closed by the corps of reserve that advanced, restored the battle, and hindered the left wing, that had been taken in flank, from being intirely defeated. This could not be well effected without losing ground; but it was obstinately disputed, and as the front was successful, the left was supported as much as possible by the detachments sent to it. However, being greatly weakened by the first disorder, and the Prussians still vigorously attacking it, there was a necessity at last of retreating, which was executed in good order, and step by step, such of the enemy as presented themselves being 1757.

At D.

con-

The immediate effect of this victory was the A.D. 1757 surrender of Breslau. His troops, in the heat of Breslau their success, were eager to assault and to surround besieged.
this living city, garrisoned by 12,000 men, by storm; but that method might have been attended with fatal consequences. Therefore his Prussian Majesty abated their ardour, and prevailed with them to bracket to more advisable measures.
He ordered the approaches to be carried on in the usual form. The Prussian army was not permitted to form a siege; it was however necessary that they should not leave behind them such a strong garrison, galled by the Austrians in that capital for its defence. They at first took possession of the suburbs called Ohlau, and of the convent of the brothers of charity, and of St. Maurice's churchyard. There they established two batteries, which were soon ready to be played. From thence they carried a parallel within 400 paces of the ditch of the city, advancing towards Schweidnitz gate.
One of the first effects of their bombs was the blowing up of a tower, situated on the shoulder of a bastion, which served as a magazine of powder,
and the explosion made a considerable breach in the ramparts. This happened on the eighth of the night, and greatly facilitated the success of the attack. The greatest part of the munition of the besieged was already dismounted, and the fire of their batteries was, on the 16th, almost entirely ceased. On the 17th the Prussians advanced considerably by sap. On the 18th they erected a new battery on the right of the parallel. On the 19th

A.D. 1791 they were advanced within 140 paces of the ditch, and the trench was considerably deepened. What by the disorder of the troops, which the sight of the assault could not avoid, the approaches were carried so far as to oblige the enemy to think of surrendering. The besieged had no sally that covered the body of the place; nor any covered way. The besiegers had turned off the little river Ohlau, and by that means had left the ditch dry; and thus there remained no resource for the enemy to defend themselves with success. They therefore resolved to capitulate, which was done on the 20th. The commanders of the garrison would have stipulated for advantages, but were obliged to submit to the condition of being made prisoners of war, with the whole garrison.

Capitulated.

Loss.

At Breslau 144,000 florins were found in the Austrian military chest, and the magazines were well stocked. Thirty-seven pieces of Prussian cannon, which were lost in the action of the 22d of November, were retaken; and besides the artillery belonging to the place, forty-four pieces of Austrian cannon were found in it.

Lignitz
surrendered

On the 29th the town of Lignitz surrendered, the garrison of which was suffered to retire, as the number of prisoners was already so great as to render the entertainment of more inconvenient. A considerable magazine of meal and oats, some artillery, and a large quantity of ammunition were secured.

The vigilance of the King of Prussia to improve every advantage is astonishing; for, notwithstanding log, showing how they lay upon the ground, his A.D.

M. J. marched on the 10th, at break of day, 1757.
with part of his army and a train of artillery, to Schweidnitz, garrisoned with 2000 men.

Schweid-
nitz attacked.

Thus did His Majesty, in a month's time, beat the Imperialists, and their auxiliaries the Prussians entirely routed the Austrians, and regained all Silesia, except the town of Schweidnitz;
about which he formed a blockade, the same day that Ratibor capitulated. And at this time the number of his prisoners exceeded the number of his whole army.

Rapidity
of the Prussian
arms.

The siege of Schweidnitz did not prevent other operations in Silesia. The King ordered his troops under the command of Baron Pauque to pursue the Austrian fugitives, who, on the 18th, arrived at Freyberg, from whence the enemy was instantly dislodged; nor did they make a more vigorous

Freyberg
taken.

defence at Freyberg, Strigau, Kunersdorff, nor any of the open towns, but fled precipitately on the first approach of the Prussians. On the 19th four officers and 200 private men were made prisoners, and sixty waggons laden with spoil for Schweidnitz taken. The 20th the Baron pursued the enemy as far as Reichenau, and attacked them on the hills near Landbut, where they had halted and intrenched themselves, having received in the morning of that day, a reinforcement of 2000 men from Liebau, which made them superior in infantry to their pursuers; yet, notwithstanding this superiority, they were driven from their trenches, and passed through Grünau and Liebau: of which towns the Prussians took possession, and other places.

A.D.
1737.Lob of the Austrians.

and found it was full of great quantities of forage, and many thousand bombs, bullets, and grenades. That the mountains of Sicily were entirely rooted, and that of the enemy that escaped driven half naked and half dead into the circle of Königgratz.

In Upper Silesia, the towns of Jägerdorf, Troppau, Teschen, and Strigau, were likewise taken.

The love of the English for the King of Prussia.

Their brave actions, so glorious and so rapid, endeared him to the people of England, who had but just before given him up for lost and a prey to his numerous enemies. They loved him, and they blessed him with affectionate admiration, exulting himself with such valour and industry, out of so many and great difficulties, and every man, at that time said, "It was a pity to have a monarch should be unsupported, or permitted to be crushed by such a power, yet a cowardly confederacy." So warm were the whole people in his favour, and so eager to show all testimonies of their good wishes to his cause, that they celebrated his birthday with marks of affection, equal to those they give to their own Sovereign, on those joyful occasions.

The Prince of Anhalt-Zerbst, who he returned from Zerbst, which was occupied early by the Prussians, not arriving at the place appointed in the well-regulated plan, that General had ordered in consequence of the late success, he was obliged to march on, and to attack the town of Zerbst, which was defended by the Austrians. The Austrians were ordered to be attacked at the two bridges to be found there. The General ordered to pass over his regular, his grenadiers, and his workmen; to make a breach & set it on fire, to break over the other French parties returned to their post at 1757. Zell.

Having pursued the war in Germany all the rigour of the season, and the necessity of the sea coast, both the victorious and the defeated, obliging them to retire out of the field, to refresh and refresh themselves in winter quarters; let us change
the scene, and view the transactions of the British ministry.

A view of the British councils
about this time.

In regard to Hanover

We have informed you that the army of observation was put again in motion, and that the returning of their arms was justified by the notorious infraction of the capitulation of Closter-Seven by the French. This was approved of and advised by the British court with promise of support.

Fidious conduct of the Dutch towards Great Britain,

The Dutch, under the pretence of friendship for Great Britain, contributed greatly to facilitate the operations of the French, by granting them
a free passage through Namur and Maastricht, for provisions, ammunition and artillery. A conduct highly prejudicial to the interest of our allies, and contrary to the laws of neutrality, under which they claimed great advantages from this nation.
Our court were highly dissatisfied with their High and Low churches for the matter, with which they yielded to this demand of the French Monarch;
and strongly remonstrated against a concession to our enemies, that was so manifestly in their favour. But where inclination, or interest bends, there never wants an excuse. Inability to resist a powerful neighbour, was pleaded as a sufficient reason for them to acquiesce in the necessity of need of a hostile nation from whom they expected to reap great commercial profits; and a plea of poverty was invented to cover an unwillingness to put their republic into a state of defence and respect. This was only a specimen of that attachment and partiality which the Dutch showed towards France, during the whole war. They pleaded necessity or convenience for every thing, that the enemy could wish to have them do or to connive at.

A. D. 1757.

Account of the Dutch Republic

This was soon exemplified in that tameness and indifference, with which they saw France take possession of Niempore and Ostend, delivered to them by the hands of the house of Austria, in defiance of treaties, of which the Republic were guarantors, for their own security, against the ambition of France. So that both duty and interest required their concurrence with Great Britain to prevent, as far as in their power, the surrender of these two sea ports and barrier towns, into the hands of the common enemy.

Favours France.

Colonel

On the 6th of July 1757, Colonel Murray arrived from the Emperor's Camp at Maastricht, for the purpose of taking leave; the letter he wrote on this occasion was as follows.

My Lord, &c.

"His Majesty's letter being brought proper to inform the small circle wherein I am now and by which to the great honour of the King, I have just now received my recall, and propose to resign it. This is possible, I shall leave it to the King's will, and I desire that your excellency would

A.D. 1602. Spain, with the seeking of, sending, for the 1602 Entry of their ships, and afterwards
 of their ships, and afterwards from England.

and Bar, high and mighty, Lord, with his two graces, that shall govern, who have taken that interest in general, have taken notice in view, and have made their resolution, with regard to
 that country, which cannot but show the neighbouring States, and as how to proceed with 1603 The two States, made no more High and Mighty, of a passage for a large number of warlike instruments, through some of the barrier towns, in order to be sent to Ostend and Newport, would not fail to excite the King's attention. The fir-ere friendship and unity of interest of Great Britain and Holland, requiring they should no longer keep silence, left in the issue, it should be considered as their interest, and as a consideration of all our right, now known as there

1604 The King, to the end that the same shall to your High and Mighty, the two-fold right shall have acquired, to keep the United Provinces under the government of their High and Mighty, and also to make the same to make the said alteration, and also, without the consent of your High and Mighty, shall the two States have referred to the state of the matter, and at the same time, of every thing that may suit their private interest, or be of their own and in the year 1605, your High and Mighty made and the same of France, Spain, and the United Provinces, and the same of the same.

1605

are

the said treaty: "It is also agreed, that no
 "provinces, town, town of city of the said Nether"lands, or of those which are given up by his Ca"tholic Majesty, shall ever be ceded, transferred,
 "conveyed, or shall ever devolve, to the crown
 "of France, or any Prince or Princess, of the "house or line of France, either by virtue of any
 "gift, exchange, marriage contract, succession by
 "will, or by any other title whatever, so the "power and authority of the most Christian King,
 "or of any Prince or Princess of the house or line
 "of France."

"In the barrier treaty these very stipulations are "repeated, in the first article: "His Imperial and
 "Catholic Majesty promises and engages that no
 "provinces, city, town, fortress, or territory of
 "of the said country, shall be ceded, transferred,
 "given or devolve to the crown of France, or to
 "any other but the succession of the German
 "dominions of the House of Austria, either by
 "donation, sale, exchange, marriage contract,
 "bequest, testamentary succession, or by any
 "other pretext whatsoever, so that no province,
 "town, fortress, or territory of the said Nether-
 "lands shall ever be subject to any other prince,
 "but remain the property of the State of the house of "Austria, excepting what has been yielded
 "by the present treaty to the said Lords of the "Seven General Estates, Decree of the 10th of "April 1713, in consequence of which it is suf"ficient to insert all that I have just mentioned to
 "your Highness in this article, and to leave the pre"sent

The Dutch warned.

1824

the people of the island in their government, possibly and a thousand families, all their fears and justifications, he undertakes to regard the advice of Great Britain, by a declaration from the French ministry to the good and upright intentions of the King, the nation, towards their right and Majesty, with assurance of security, not only from insult from the French troops, but of protection from any others, in which he said they were more in danger to be exposed, on account of their observance of the neutrality. A most glaring instance of the insufficiency of oxen and guarantees, to secure and perpetuate the best condition of peace! What could be more firmly stipulated by the latter treaty, and the treaty of Utrecht? What could be devised as the constant to stop the torrent of French violence, for their invading and overrunning upon Holland and Germany, even then a strong barrier? What could prevent France, without the least possibility, if the barrier should be destroyed? What could be more solemnly engaged than by the Dutch in guarantee, to exert the utmost of their strength to maintain that barrier against all attempts of the French? Yet you see the two principal reasons within that barrier, which will in time be ready millions of money, and so many thousand lives to employ, for the maintenance of Holland and the land, the neutrality given them the possession of France, which will in time be ready to employ
millions of money, and so many thousand lives to
employ, for the maintenance of Holland and the
land, the neutrality given them the possession of France, which will in time be ready to employ

1713

Yield to the French

of the Barbary

Insuffiency of treaties

1713

1713

Spain's conduct. The conduct of the Spaniards by the Duke of Parma, which was extremely popular upon the landing of the Duke of Parma, and the conduct of the Spaniards in Spain, during all this summer, and the Duke of Parma referred the Duke, behaved with more decency towards the English nation: though their conduct was very much suspected of an inclination to favour the interest of France; and the Duke of Italy was kept in awe by the cruizers sent from Gibraltar, up the Straights. But, if possible, it was good policy to give them no foundation of a quarrel with us.

In this situation of Europe, the time approached for the meeting of the British parliament, which was summoned to do business on the first of December. But as the business of this session does most properly relate to the next year, we shall not touch upon any affairs or matters done in either house of parliament, till we have summed up the memorable events of the present year, and given an account of the ships taken on both sides.

A review of the transactions of this year.

In Germany.

It is what light posterity will view the transactions of the year 1757, is uncertain; they appear to us, that live at the time, and know them to be facts, in a marvellous light. It is scarce credible, what we have seen achieved, and what we have seen mismanaged. The space of a single year never exhibited in the whole of a single country, never produced so many astonishing events, never displayed so many astonishing effects, as that we have seen.

English Revolution? not only beyond A.D. 1777
 the most distant expectation; but far beyond what the most sagacious foresight, reaching from experience and the nature of things, could possibly have imagined. Behold, in the beginning of the year the King of Prussia was triumphant; the whole power of the Austrians was totally defeated, and their hopes were utterly ruined. — Suddenly the Austrian affairs were re-established; their armies victorious, and the King of Prussia defeated, abandoned by his allies; surrounded by his enemies, and reduced to the very brink of despair. —
 He rises and triumphs again, beyond all hopes,
 and defeats and levels to the ground the united power of France, Austria and the Empire. Forty thousand Hanoverians, a whole army, instead of 80,000 French, and are only as prisoners of war:
 the French become possessors of all the country between the Weser and the Elbe; yet these same Hanoverians resume their arms, and recover their country. Within this year there have been 400,000 men in action. Six pitched battles have been fought. Three great armies demolished.
 The French army of 120,000 men reduced and vanquished without fighting. The Russians victorious, yet flying, as if they had been vanquished.
 A confederacy of the five greatest powers in Europe, in violence and small intestine all the strength of their power destroyed and buried in one single campaign by the King of Prussia.

Change the scene to Great Britain. We see the British flag insubordinate and the stars of empire set upon

Is the British flag

1757
 upon by the British, in favour of France, with larger numbers, than ever before, and many, returning from Europe, who were struggling to find an establishment, where there was neither food nor arms sufficient to withstand their forces. All the northern province in America left open to the enemy. The troops that should have defended them, were forced to be evacuated at Halifax, while the French revenged and conquered what they pleased. A fleet and army, that cost the nation upwards of a million, to hold a council of war in Nova Scotia,
 while the French, with a few Indians, were conquering all before them: so that the British glory seemed to sink in every place, except where those unparalleled military achievements were performed in the east. In Bengal Clive upheld his country's fame for four of years. With less than 3000 men he defeated upwards of 40,000 Moors and French: he recovered our settlements, raised the French in those parts, delivered the natives of Bengal, &c. from a tyrant, and placed a Nabob upon the throne: he even conquered that extraordinary, populous, rich kingdom with less force, and in less time, than an insignificant fortress has been reduced in Germany. In the other parts of East India our people were neglected, and not in a condition to face the enemy in the field, while the French were considerably reinforced from Europe, and preparing to give the last stroke to our trade and empire in the east of America.
 To which the command of Viceroy, Sir M.
 Oglethorpe, was only a small assistance.

In East India.

The

[illegible]

factures and merchandize. The number of ships taken from the French, and laden with French property, were 304, of which 115 were considerable privateers and armed merchantmen, carrying 1260 guns, and upwards of ten thousand men. The ships taken by the French from the subjects of Great Britain, greatly exceeded this number, and amounted to 571 great and small vessels. But they were neither so fast nor so well armed with cannon as the French.

Made by
the English :

By the
French.

Amongst the French prizes we find several valuable cargoes, as well as four prisoners. The least remarkable, both as to their contents, and to their defence, was, the Pondicherry, an East Indiaman, burdened 1000 tons, taken by the Dover man at sea, after a short engagement of about an hour, in which her second captain and five men were killed. — The Bien Aiguis carrying 30 soldiers, 1000 casks of flour, 60 barrels of gun-powder, five casks of lead, &c. &c. &c.

A.D. 1757 and bomb-shells, ammunition, soldiers, &c. was taken by the Tigre, privateer of Bristol. The Esperance and the Nova de Dieu, laden on the same account, both for the Mississippi.—The Grand Biche, carrying 22 nine pounders on one deck, and the Henry, laden with soldiers and naval stores for Louisbourg.—The Invincible privateer of St. Maloes, which mounted 24 guns, nine pounders, shipped 286 men, and engaged his Majesty's ship Unicorn two hours and a half; during the action the captain was killed, but Lieutenant Clement fought the ship till he obliged the Frenchman to strike. The privateers had near fifty killed and wounded; the Unicorn had no more than the boatswain, armourer, and a marine killed, and five men wounded.—The Mountain Oiler privateer of 20 guns, nine pounders, which, after striking to the Tartar, had the assurance to refuse their arms and to board their conqueror. But they paid dearly for their treachery, six-and-thirty being killed, and many of them wounded:—The Renouée, burden 350 tons, laden chiefly with pork, flour, and 200 muskets; and the Superbe, burden 750 tons, laden with all kinds of goods, warlike stores, provisions and 200 officers and soldiers, 240 barrels of powder, 200 muskets and bayonets:—The Queen of Angles, a Dominica-man, of 18 guns, valued at two millions of livres.—The Duke de Aquitaine, an East

This ship had loaded her cargo, which was very rich, at St. Pierre and Martin; and was now bound out as a man of East India ship, of 1500 tons, mounting 50 guns, 18 pounders, and carrying 493 men; she fought his Majesty's ships Eagle and Medway, very briskly, for three quarters of an hour, and then struck her colours, having lost 50 men killed and 24 dangerously wounded, besides many more, that were hurt. All her masts, sails and rigging were so shattered, that they broke away and fell overboard. The loss on our side was ten men killed, and 32 wounded on board the Eagle; the Medway, which was employed only in raking the enemy, had no more than ten men wounded:—The Duc d'Aquillain privateer, of 24 nine pounders and two four pounders, each large gun weighing 300 lb. heavier than the Tartar's, was taken by his Majesty's ship Tartar, Captain Lockhart, off the Isle of Wight, after an engagement of one hour and twelve minutes. The Tartar fired 43 broadsides, and killed and wounded 50 of the enemy, with the loss of only four killed and one wounded:—The Aquilon, a French man of war, of 48 guns and 450 men, maintained a running fight for two hours with the *Antelope*¹, and then was forced upon the rocks in the north part of Hodiernne Bay, where she was irrecoverably lost:—The Melampe privateer of Bayonne, of 700 tons, 36 guns and 320 men, taken after an engage-of war, with orders to watch off the coast of Lisbon, so that she might be able to catch any English ships, reported to fall from that post in a few days.

¹ The Antelope had then 24 guns and 240 men.

A.D. spent of these hours, by his Majesty's ship Tartar, of 28 guns and 200 men, Captain Lockhart, 1757. — And the Hermione, French frigate, of 26 thirteen pounders and two nine pounders, struck to Captain Elliot, of his Majesty's ship Hussar, built of fir, who also, about the same time, sunk a large French two-decker, without being able to save a man.

Let us not conclude the annals of this year without recording the gallant action of Peter Murray, the boatwain of the St. George from Smyrna, richly laden, and taken by the Bien Aimé, a French privateer. Peter Murray and three sailors belonging to the St. George, were left on board the prize; and seventeen Frenchmen were put on

On board the Hermione were some of the Tilbury's people, who greatly praised the humanity of the inhabitants of the little fishing town, near the place where they were wrecked: who not only concealed them from the barbarous savages, but supplied them with all necessaries they could spare. — An example, that greatly upheld their mother country, where at this very time, the English prisoners were most cruelly treated, according to the account of Captain Clarke, of the Exeter, published in the London papers, and dated Fitchamp in Normandy, July 6. "We both live worse, says he, and lie worse than the hogs do in England: we lie on flint pavement, and have but a pound of straw each man to spread under us, and nothing but the roof of the house and heavens to cover us. Our living is most miserably bad; we have nothing but bread allowed for breakfast, and at dinner a quarter of a pound of beef a man, boiled all to pieces for soup, and some musty cyder to drink; at supper we have bread, water, and green cals boiled up together." And this was better treatment, than some met with in Old France.

board to navigate her to Marfeilles. In the passage Peter found means to secure the arms, and then, by confining some, wounding others, and obliging the rest to assist him, he, with his three Englishmen, retook possession of the ship, without killing one man, and carried her safe into the port of Barcelona'.——Neither ought we to pass over in silence the engagement of his Majesty's ship Southampton, Captain Gilchrist, with five French privateers, off the Isle of Wight. Two of the privateers were of equal force with the Southampton. The captain fought them almost three hours, one hour of which time he was between two fires. In this situation his men behaved so gallantly, that, though it was not in his

A. D.
1757.

' The Mills of Hull, Mr. Claude, master, from Virginia, was taken off of Nantakett-shoals, in October 1756, by a French privateer from Louisbourg, of which ship Captain Zechariah Norman, of the Porter, of Liverpool, gave the following account in August last. "The Frenchmen took out the master and most of the crew, leaving the mate, William Lawson, second mate, carpenter, and two or three more Englishmen on board, along with thirty-two Frenchmen, with an intent to send her to Louisbourg. By distress of weather they were beat off the coast, and having exhausted all the provisions, even till they were obliged to eat the cat and dog, a shark's tail, that was nailed on the vessel's stern, a horse hide, designed to preserve the rigging when gauled, and fowl's dung fried in oil, they resigned, in December, the ship to the hands of the English, who carried her into Placentia-harbour, in Newfoundland, having then little or no water left, and in the utmost distress for all necessaries of life."

A. D. 1757. power to bring them into port, he entirely silenced one of them, and obliged the other to drop anchor of her comrade; Captain Gilchrist's ship having received eight dangerous shot between wind and water, ten men killed, fourteen mortally wounded, and as many rendered incapable of their service, he was not in a condition to pursue, and therefore put into Weymouth to repair damages, and to recruit.

There were several other gallant achievements by our naval commanders, whose accounts not being transmitted to England till the next year, will more properly come within the contents of the following book.

THE
GENERAL HISTORY
OF THE LATE WAR.

BOOK III.

Containing the several expeditions against the coast of France, and the coast of Africa. The campaigns of Senegal, Gambia, Louisbourg, Cape Breton, and of several forts in North America. The success of the army of observation, under the command of Prince Ferdinand. Great Britain's connections with Prussia. The campaign in Germany between the King of Prussia and the Imperialists, Austrians, Russians, French and Swedes. The state of the war in East India: and the success of our naval power against the French, during the year 1758.

THE inactivity and disgraces of the last campaign, both in America and on the coast of France, were not less dissatisfactory to the nation, than the miscarriages in the preceding year; but their heats were somewhat cooled by the good opinion the generality of the people ex-

A. D.
1758.

Dissatisfaction.

A. D.
1758.

Sentiments
upon the late expedition,

sustained at Mr. PERRY, and with the expectation that the time was at hand, when delinquents would be brought to punishment; and the service both by sea and land would be put into better hands.

The patriots could not be silent upon the occasion. "It has, said they, been the great misfortune of Britain to have the grand business of the nation retarded at home by party debates, and the success of her arms abroad frustrated by tame assemblies and councils of war. When a commander in chief holds such councils to deliberate whether, or not, he shall carry his orders into execution, there is certainly great room to entertain suspicions of his conduct. From such cautious proceedings, we may be led to conclude, That he is either afraid of doing his duty; or that he has received some secret counter-orders to warrant his inactivity: and that, therefore, he chuses to screen himself under the resolutions of a council of war, as a colourable pretext for not pursuing his public and visible orders."

"Indeed it may be prudent in a general or admiral, to advise with his officers about the particular means of executing his orders; but whether it is advisable to execute them, or not, ought to be the determination of his own judgment. For, it is easy to conceive, that, if a commander in chief intimates his inclination to the inferior insufficient inspiration, that he is inclined to pacify Art. D.

1799. or inactive transfers. And, in such a case, no doubt, the inferior officers will not fail to adapt their advice to the general disposition; for, few are animated with such enthusiastic valour, as to give their votes for braving the dangers of war,
when their general affords them so handsome a pledge for keeping out of harm's way.

"If the mysterious reasons are not unravelled,
which induced the conductors of the late expedition (against Rochefort) to return without attempting to perform the intended service, we can never hope to succeed in any future undertaking. Part of their orders have been inserted in the Gazette, for public information and satisfaction; and the publication of them does honour to the Secretary, who subscribed them. We are not now under an administration that will countenance falsehood, or seek to palliate misconduct, or sacrifice innocent blood to their own safety.

"We are told in the Gazette, openly and ingenuously, that no attempt had been made to land;
and as they were bound by their orders to make a descent, if practicable, they have certainly acted in direct breach of their duty; if, by their delays and deliberations, they rendered that impracticable,
which might have been originally feasible.

"It is discomfiting to reflect, that England

For, it is easy to conceive, that, if a commander is thus intimated his inclination to the inferior officers, he will find no great difficulty to procure a majority to coincide in his opinion. Besides, the very calling a council of war, to deliberate whether he shall execute his orders, or not, is a sufficient

THE GENERAL HISTORY OF

42
A.D. 1758. military virtue. But it is to be hoped that this extraordinary instance of ill-conduct will undergo the cognizance of a higher judicatory; and that the parliament will inspect into this mysterious transaction.

“As the meeting of that great assembly is near at hand, it is much to be wished, that instead of wasting our time in vague conjectures, and ineffectual exclamations, we would apply ourselves to make remonstrances to our several representatives, and earnestly intreat them seriously and vigorously to investigate the cause of this shameful event, by means of a national enquiry. Such an application from their constituents will animate their zeal: and when they meet in parliament, may no party divisions distract their councils. Such personal dissensions are always prejudicial to the nation, but they would now be immediately fatal.

“No parliament ever assembled under such critical circumstances. The kingdom has this year expended above eight millions and a half, only to purchase losses and disgrace.—Fresh supplies, and large ones too, must be raised for the service of the next year: and can it be supposed that, in the present declining state of the public credit, people will be forward to contribute, unless past injuries are punished, and they perceive a disposition towards future amendment.

“The fate of the nation will probably depend on the operations of the ensuing session. Let the dark schemes, which have baffled the hopes deliberations, they rendered that impracticable, which might have been originally feasible.

"It is disgraceful to reflect, that England must once more be disturbed with the melancholy parade of a court-martial; for frequent court-martials are certain indications of the decline of military of the public, and frustrated the spirited and well-directed efforts of a patriotic ministry, be dragged into light. The parliamentary enquiry will now be reversed: instead of defending the people against the abuses of the ministry, we hope that they will vindicate the ministry for the sake of the people."

THE WAR.

43

A. D.
1758.

Such was the language, such the wishes and desires of the nation. And the minister could not help, on a very solemn occasion, some time after, declaring, "That he believed there was a determined resolution, both in the naval and military commanders, against any vigorous exertion of the national power in the service of their country!" He affirmed, "That, though his Majesty appeared ready to embrace every measure proposed by his ministers, for the honour and interest of his British dominions; yet, scarce a man could be found; with whom the execution of any one plan, in which there was the least appearance of any danger, could, with confidence, be trusted." He particularized the inactivity of one gentleman in North America, from whom the nation had conceived great expectations. He complained, "That this n—— commander had expressed the most contemptuous disregard for the civil power, from which he derived his authority, by neglecting to transmit, for a considerable length of time, any other advice of his proceedings, but what appeared on a written scrap of paper." He observed, "That with a force by sea and land, greater than

Concerning the commanders by sea
and land.

ever

A.D. 1756. over the nation had hitherto maintained, with a King and ministry ardently desirous of redressing her glory, succouring her allies and promoting her true interest, a shameful dislike to service every where prevailed, and few seemed affected with any other zeal, than that of aspiring to the highest posts, and grasping the largest salaries."

In the heat of these complaints the parliament met, and his Majesty opened the session" with this most gracious speech:

My Lords, and Gentlemen,

His Majesty's
Speech.

IT would have given me the greatest pleasure to have acquainted you, at the opening of this session, that our success in carrying on the war had been equal to the justice of our cause, and the extent and vigour of the measures formed for that purpose.

I have the firmest confidence, that the spirit and bravery of this nation, so renowned in all times, and which have formerly surmounted so many difficulties, are not to be abated by some disappointments. These, I trust, by the blessing of God, and your zeal and ardour for my honour, and the welfare of your country, may be retrieved. It is my fixt resolution to apply my utmost efforts for the security of my kingdom, and for the recovery and protection of the possessions and rights of my crown and subjects in America, and elsewhere, as well by the strongest exertion of our

"On the 12 of December 1757.

naval

naval force, and by all other methods. Another great object, which I have at heart, is the preservation of the Protestant religion, and the liberties of Europe, and in that view to adhere to, and encourage my allies. For this cause, I shall decline no inconveniences; and, in this cause, I earnestly desire your hearty concurrence, and vigorous assistance. The late signal success in Germany has given a happy turn to affairs, which it is incumbent upon us to improve; and, in this critical conjuncture, the eyes of all Europe are upon you. In particular, I must recommend it to you, that my good brother and ally the King of Prussia, may be supported in such a manner, as his magnanimity and active zeal for the common cause deserve.

Gentlemen of the House of Commons,
It gives me the utmost concern, that the large supplies, which you have already granted for carrying on the war, have not produced all the good effects we had reason to hope for. But I have so great a reliance on your wisdom, as not to doubt of your perseverance. I only desire such supplies as shall be necessary for the public service; and, to that end, have ordered the proper estimates to be laid before you. You may depend upon it, that the best and most faithful oeconomy shall be used.

My Lords, and Gentlemen,
I have had such ample experience of the loyalty and good affections of my faithful subjects towards

46 THE GENERAL HISTORY OF

A.D. 1758. wards me, my family, and government, in all circumstances, that I am confident they are not to be shaken. But I cannot avoid taking notice of that spirit of disorder, which has shown itself amongst the common people, in some parts of the kingdom*. Let me recommend it to you, to do your part in discouraging and suppressing such abuses, and for maintaining the laws, and lawful authority. If any thing shall be found wanting, to explain or enforce what may have been misunderstood or misrepresented, I am persuaded it will not escape your attention.

Nothing can be so conducive to the defence of all that is dear to us, as well as for reducing our enemies to reason, as union and harmony amongst ourselves.

Remarks. It is very evident, in this speech, that there were no thoughts of a parliamentary enquiry into the conduct of the commanders, either in Europe or America, as the people expected, and ardently desired. That was removed, with a promise of more activity, both by sea and land, in future measures and operations. Here also we may discover a settled resolution in the cabinet, to assist our German allies heartily and vigorously. Yet the voice of the Sovereign was never received with more unanimity by both houses of parliament, nor could any thing exceed the zeal with which they promised to assist his Majesty in what ever

* Occasioned by a scarcity, and the engrossing of bread.

At D.
1756

• The humble address of the Right Honourable the Lords spiritual temporal in and out of parliament assembled.

Most gracious Sovereign, We your Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the Lords spiritual and temporal in parliament assembled, beg leave to return your Majesty our humble thanks for your most gracious speech from the throne.

The reasons which you are pleased to express for the disappointments that have unhappily attended some of the measures formed by your Majesty this year, for carrying on the just war, in which we are engaged, is a fresh mark of your paternal regard for the welfare of your people, and for the glory of this kingdom.

The testimony which your Majesty has, at the same time, given to the spirit and bravery of this nation, and the ardent zeal of your parliament, to retrieve these misfortunes, is a proof of the justice done by your royal mind to our principles and sentiments, and the greatest encouragement to persevere in them.

Affected therefore, as we are, with these events, we are not discouraged; but we sincerely promise your Majesty our hearty concurrence, and most vigorous assistance, in accomplishing, under the protection of divine providence, your wise and gracious intentions for our defence and safety at home, and for recovering and securing the rights and possessions of your crown and subjects in America, and elsewhere; particularly by the utmost exertion of that essential part of our strength, your naval force.

The preservation of the Protestant religion, and the liberties of Europe, are never to be forgotten by us. Of this pure religion, and these invaluable liberties, Great Britain has, in all times, been a principal bulwark; and cannot fail to continue so, under your Majesty's auspicious reign.

At

AND ever related to his British dominions and interest by sea and land; and also to support the King of Prussia,

As the late signal success in Germany fills us with unfeigned joy, so it animates our hopes to see this glorious cause revive; and we do with equal thankfulness and satisfaction, acknowledge your Majesty's generous disposition, that for the sake of it, you will decline no inconveniences.

To defend your Majesty against all your enemies, to support your honour and real interests, and to strengthen your allies are our indispensable duty. It shall also be our endeavour to improve this success to the most useful purpose; and to exert ourselves in supporting your good ally the King of Prussia, whose magnanimity and unexampled firmness are so evident to all the world, and of such great utility to the common cause.

We have seen, with the utmost abhorrence, that spirit of disorder and riot which has shewn itself of late among the common people. We are sensible that it is inconsistent with all government, and necessary to be reformed and suppressed. Nothing shall be wanting on our part, for this salutary purpose; and to enforce and add strength to the laws and lawful authority, on which the liberty and property of the meanest, as well as of the chief of your subjects depend.

Your Majesty's kind admonition, of the necessity of union and harmony among ourselves is highly worthy of the common father of your people: we will always have it before our eyes. And we give your Majesty the strongest assurances, that our loyalty and good affections to your Majesty, and your royal family, of which we have, on all occasions, given real proof, are never to be shaken or diminished. The preservation of your sacred person, the stability of your government, and the continuance of the Protestant succession in your illustrious house, will ever be most dear to us, and essential to the happiness of all your people.

THE GENERAL HISTORY OF

the army of observation, over the French under the Duke of Orleans, the various and various of villanous and The lenitives made use of in the front of his Majesty's speech, were not the only means used to stop a parliamentary inquiry into the causes of that miscarriage on the coast of Spain; but very extraordinary methods had been tried to stop the spirit of rebellion, and instructing the members on that dangerous occasion, in the national heat of resentment evaporated in a court-martial, that did honour to Sir John Montague, and left the publick as much in the dark, as they were before, relative to their approbation of the former conduct, and with a bar to all future enquiries into that miscarriage. — It is a remarkable however, that the very same party, which had before justified themselves by their sanguine, fervent and unshaken faith in the perfection of Villu

the army of observation, over the French under the Duke of Orleans, the various and various of villanous and The lenitives made use of in the front of his Majesty's speech, were not the only means used to stop a parliamentary inquiry into the causes of that miscarriage on the coast of Spain; but very extraordinary methods had been tried to stop the spirit of rebellion, and instructing the members on that dangerous occasion, in the national heat of resentment evaporated in a court-martial, that did honour to Sir John Montague, and left the publick as much in the dark, as they were before, relative to their approbation of the former conduct, and with a bar to all future enquiries into that miscarriage. — It is a remarkable however, that the very same party, which had before justified themselves by their sanguine, fervent and unshaken faith in the perfection of Villu

The French army, under the Duke of Orleans, the various and various of villanous and The lenitives made use of in the front of his Majesty's speech, were not the only means used to stop a parliamentary inquiry into the causes of that miscarriage on the coast of Spain; but very extraordinary methods had been tried to stop the spirit of rebellion, and instructing the members on that dangerous occasion, in the national heat of resentment evaporated in a court-martial, that did honour to Sir John Montague, and left the publick as much in the dark, as they were before, relative to their approbation of the former conduct, and with a bar to all future enquiries into that miscarriage. — It is a remarkable however, that the very same party, which had before justified themselves by their sanguine, fervent and unshaken faith in the perfection of Villu

A.D. 1756. these kingdoms in those means, which will ever disgrace his predecessors for their inactivity and timidity. He was resolved that neither fleet nor army should eat the bread of the nation in idleness. And he had the wisdom to plan his operations against the enemy, so as to make them subservient to the great end of self-preservation to his country. He considered the strength and defence of these kingdoms, to consist in, and so depend on, the naval power duly exerted: and he put the whole into employ.

He fixed his thoughts upon the conquest of Louisbourg and Cape Breton, without which it would be impossible to secure the British Empire in that quarter of the world. But he could not be unmindful of the disappointments, that expedition had met with last year; whether by betraying the secrets of the cabinet, or by the misconduct of those employed in the execution of the plan, he had fearfully and religiously formed for that purpose.

Expedition
on Louis-
bourg.

The early notice received by the enemy of the intention of the British, was against Louisbourg, had given the French an opportunity to send a force superior to that intended by us against that fortress: the detention of the fleet under Admiral

The list of the English army at this time stood as follows: 100 line of battle, 118 frigates, from 40 down to 20 guns, 40 bombs, masts, bullets, &c. in all 200 tons of war. Besides four ships of 74 guns, two of 60, six of 50, and two of 30 guns, upon the stocks, and six great fire-ships. The last 16 built of 40, and to carry 30 barrels.

Holbourne,

Halibourne, which enabled the French Squadron to go to their station in that harbour, before his arrival in those seas, and the inactivity of the army ordered against it, as well as of the fleet, after his arrival at Halifax, suggested the means to prevent a miscarriage for the future, from the like causes.

The plan against Louisbourg was revived and carried in council, and all the contingent operations were sealed for North America. The fleet and land forces against that important, and chief fortress of the French in North America, were adequate to the service. 8000 men were destined to drive the French from the Ohio; and 16000 men were ordered to reduce Crown Point, and to open a way to the frontiers of Canada. The chief command on the continent of North America, was taken from Lord Loudon, who was superseded by Major General Abercrombie; and the forces both by sea and land, to be sent against Louisbourg, were placed under the command of Admiral Boscawen in chief. But the greatest difficulty was to guard against the counter-arms of the French, whose powerful fleet, at the time they were obliged last winter, to leave Louisbourg by the inclemency of the climate, had arrived in the ports of Old France in a most sickly feeble condition.

Mr. PITT neither trusted to fidelity, nor secrecy, nor yet to his own vigour and expedition: though the whole month of December was employed for this purpose, in the greatest naval pre-

AD 1759.

Forces for this expedition and for North America.

How guarded against treachery, &c.

supplies and stores. Vol. III.

of the late war.

A.D.
1758.

positions, that had ever been known at this season of the year: so that the expedition fleet against Louisbourg sailed from England on the 19th day of February. For, though the French, at this juncture, had no naval strength nor land force in America, equal to that shipped with Admiral Boscawen, nor any commander of equal capacity and reputation; he judged it necessary to provide ways and means to prevent their sending a superior force after him, to retard, obstruct, or perhaps, to defeat his instructions and orders. Therefore, at the same time as the grand expedition was fitting out for North America, Mr. Pitt fixed his eye upon the sea ports of France, and stationed two squadrons, in such a judicious manner, as not only to block up the ports of Toulon and Rochefort, where, he had certain intelligence, the French were equipping two fleets for the relief of Louisbourg, but to deter the Spaniards from sending any assistance by their navy to the French. The station for interrupting or preventing the Toulon fleet proceeding to North America, was at the Straights mouth, and Admiral Osborne had orders

By blocking up the French
navy.

1. Their navy at this juncture consisted of 77 line of battle ships, 39 frigates, from 36 to 12 guns each.

2. The Spanish navy consisted of 52 line of battle ships, 26 frigates, from 30 to 16 guns; four packet boats of 16 guns; 13 xebecs of 24 guns, four bombs of 12 guns, and four fire-ships. But these ships wanted 30,000 men to put them to sea: which could not then be found in Spain.

to cruise for that purpose, between Cape de Gatt and the Spanish port of Carthagena. A. D. 1758.

The French Squadron at Toulon was equipped with great expedition, and sailed under the command of M. de la Clue. But finding the Straits so well guarded with English men of war, and himself too weak to force the passage, he put into Carthagena, with his squadron, either to catch an opportunity to slip by the English fleet, or to be reinforced from Toulon. Accordingly a second squadron, of four ships, was equipped in that port, to strengthen de la Clue's, blocked up in the harbour of Carthagena. Two of them had slipped into Carthagena. La Clue only waited for the other three. Of which the French Admiral made himself so sure, that he ventured into the Offing and cruised for a few days off the mouth of that harbour, that he might be ready to proceed without loss of time. Admiral Osborne kept his station, and placed a frigate, called the Gibraltar, to watch the enemy's motions. At last the other three French men of war took their departure from Toulon, under the command of M. du Quesne, an able officer, and the same, that had done us so much mischief in North America. His instructions were, to join la Clue, to escort him through the Gutt, then to proceed with these three ships to Brest, while la Clue made the best of his way to Louisbourg. Du Quesne was also appointed to sail with the Brest fleet to North

Disappointment
of the Toulon
Squadron.

* The Foudroyant, 80 guns, the Orpheu, 64 guns, the Orléans of 50 guns.

A. D. America, and to have the chief command both by sea and land.

The Gibraltar frigate obeyed her orders so punctually, that she fell in with du Quesne's three ships, and led them such a wildgoose chase, that after forty hours pursuit the Frenchmen, at two o'clock on the 28th day of February, in the morning, found themselves in the midst of the English fleet, without being able to come up with her. M. du Quesne, who commanded the Foudroyant, soon perceived his condition, but was afraid to make any signal, lest that should discover him; and at day break Mr. Osborne perceived some strangers, and made them the signal, which as he found they did not answer, but edged off, he fired a few guns at the Foudroyant: but he was rather too far to do any great mischief. On this she made a signal, and the other ships made sail and stood different ways. Mr. Osborne then made the Monmouth's, Swiftsure's, and Hampton-Court's signals to chase the Foudroyant, the Revenge and Berwick to chase L'Orpheus, and Monarque and Montague to chase the other, these last drove her ashore, but somehow or other she got under a bit of a castle. They quitted her on being fired at from thence. The Monmouth, being the best going ship of the fleet, stood for the Foudroyant, and passed close by L'Orpheus, which she did not fire at: but left her to the Revenge, whom she saw gaining on her. A little after five the Monmouth and her chace, having seen the fleet all out of sight, except the Swiftsure, who was so very far astern, that they

CAPTAIN GARDINER.

A. D. the line. The one had 1000 men and 80 guns; 1758. the other 470 men and 64 guns. The captain of a privateer taken by the Monmouth had boasted greatly of this ship, and insisted she was not to be taken: she would fight, he said to-day, and to-morrow, and next day, but never could be taken. This is as gallant an action as ever was performed by a single ship. It is greatly to be lamented, that poor Gardiner did not live to reap the glory of so great an action. He told his people before the engagement, "This ship, says he, must be taken"; she looks to be above our match; but

Englishmen

Extract of a letter from an officer on board the Volunteer, privateer, in Gibraltar bay, March 28.

We arrived here on Sunday. The morning we came in, we had the pleasure to see two of our men of war of 60 guns each (the Monmouth and Revenge) bring in two French men of war, one of 80, the other of 64 guns, the Foudroyant and Orphée.

This, the Foudroyant, is the very ship the French Admiral Galissoniere was in when he met Byng off Minorca. Captain Gardiner, two days before he left this port (in company with Lord R—— B—— and the merchant our agent, with whom I dined yesterday) with great anguish of soul told them, that my Lord A—— had reflected on him, and told him that he was one of the men who had brought disgrace upon the nation; that it touched him excessively, but that it ran strongly in his mind, that he should have an opportunity shortly to convince his lordship, how much he had the honour of the nation at heart, and that he was not culpable. Before he expired, he sent for his first lieutenant, and told him, the last favour he could ask of him was never to give up the ship. The lieutenant told him he never would, and instantly went and sailed the flag to the staff, and stood at it with a brace of pistols, declaring Englishmen are not so mind that, nor will I quit her while this ship can swim, or I have a soul left alive." The honest tars cheered him, and said they depended on him for victory, and he might depend on them.

A.D.
1758.

L'Orpheus stood for Carthagena, and the Revenge, to prevent her getting in, was obliged to engage her at a great disadvantage; she was so nigh the harbour, that the French ships were all manned on the yards and mast-heads, looking at the action, but dur'd not venture out to her assistance; but let us block them up, and take a ship in light of their fleet, equal to the party that blocked them up.

In thirty-six minutes after the first fire she struck; but had killed near 120 of our people; among which were the captain of marines, and master and a lieutenant. Captain Storr was wounded in the leg with a musket ball. The Berwick, indeed, got up time enough to have something in the victory; but had she not done so, the Orpheus acknowledged, it would have been the same thing. The Revenge and Orpheus were not much hurt, that is, the ships themselves; but the other two were greatly damaged, especially the Foudroyant, her fore-mast, though not carrying he would put any man to death who attempted to come near the colours to strike them, until he was dead: in short, it is the bravest action, by all accounts, that has been known in the memory of man. I was on board the Foudroyant the day she came in: all that I will say of her is, That she will be the pride of England, and the shame of France.

ried,

A.D.
1754

ship was shot almost to pieces, and her hull was like a sieve on the side she Monmouth engaged her.

Thus was this scheme of relieving Louisbourg frustrated. For M. de la Clue not being in a condition to force a passage, nor to escape the vigilant commander of the English Squadron, he took the resolution and the first opportunity to sail back to Toulon; where his ships were laid up.

And of the Rochefort
squadron.

It was then tried what could be done at Rochefort. Six ships of the line and two frigates, with 40 transports carrying 3000 troops, had orders to sail from thence with all expedition to North America. Besides 15 more transports which took in men, provisions and stores, &c. at Bourdeaux, and to be conveyed by certain men of war from the Isle of Aix. Sir Edward Hawke, who was charged with this service, made Basque road on the third day of April, with seven ships of the line and three frigates; and at day break discovered a numerous convoy a few leagues to windward. He immediately threw out the signal to chase. Which was obeyed with great cheerfulness by the whole fleet. But the wind baffling, the convoy with three frigates that escorted them got into St. Martins, on the Isle of Rhé, except one brig, which was seen, shot and burnt by the Hussars.

Intercepted by Sir Edward Hawke.

About four in the afternoon, the same day, the enemy's grand convoy from Rochefort, consisted

* Of 40 transports, with 3000 men on board.

by the Florent of 74 guns, the Spbyn 64, the Hardi 64, the Dragon 64, the Warwick 60, and seven frigates, very plainly discovered lying off the Isle of Aix, waiting for the other convoy, which had fled into St. Martins, and had been ordered to join those off the Isle of Aix. But when they found their mistake, and that it was an English squadron running down upon them, then with all the sail they could make, the enemy began to cut and slip their cables, and to run in great confusion. This was about five o'clock, and at six their commodore made off: and many of those ships which fled, were by this time on the mud.

The darkness of the night put an end to the chase: and next morning it was a droll sight to see all the enemy's ships aground, and almost dry, about five miles distant from the English fleet. Besides, many of them, both King's ships and transports were on their broad sides. Admiral Hawke selected the best pilots for that coast, and sent them on board the Intrepid and Midway, with orders to anchor as near as possible to the enemy's ships. When these two ships had got a gun-shot further in, they anchored, and spending a little

The Bliss of 64 guns, with the Plato and Proserpine fire ships, ordered to join Admiral Hawke in the Bay, fell in also with a fleet of transports, ordered by the Comte, a 28 gun frigate, from Bordeaux for Quebec. They took the frigate, a letter of marque of 60 guns, and one transport. Two more of which were picked up by the Antelope and the Spadewell sloops. Captain Hume of the Plato lost his life, as he engaged the letter of marque.

A. D.
1758.

a-head at high-water they found but five fathoms; of which the tide rises 18 feet: and every expedient that could be invented on shore and on board of the enemy, to lighten and to drag the ships through the soft mud being tried, some of the men of war, that day, by throwing out their ballast, guns and stores, and with the help of boats and launches, that brought them warps from Rochefort, &c. got as far as the mouth of the Charante, and rendered all the endeavours of our Admiral to follow them ineffectual. But our frigates boats cut away about 20 buoys laid on their anchors, and on what they had thrown over-board: therefore, after destroying the new works carrying on at the Isle Madame, which was done next morning by 140 marines, landed under the command of Captain Ewer, the Admiral returned from Basque road.

Disables
the French
at sea.

This disappointment of the enemy's design gave the finishing stroke and totally defeated their equipments, for the relief of Louisbourg, and for the reinforcement of their army upon the continent of North America. The loss of the guns, stores, &c. and the damage done to their ships, could not be repaired and recovered with any prospect of arriving at their desired ports, in the new world, before it would be too late to do any service.—Which is evident from their not venturing out to sea again.

On the other part, our vigilant and wise minister, having prevented all opposition from Old France to the operations planned against her dominions minions and proceedings in North America; and still possessed of the chief strength of the nation by sea and land, he turned our whole force to such objects as, at once, might secure the British Isles from invasion, and make a diversion in favour of our German allies.

There were, at this time, some persons of great weight in the administration, who were for making a push in Europe against France, on the side of Germany; and urged strenuously for a reinforcement of Prince Ferdinand's army, sufficient to enable him to pursue the French, and to take some considerable advantage of their distressed condition; because, it was their argument, Prince Ferdinand would thereby be in a capacity to bring matters to a conclusion; as that would enable him to carry the war into France itself; especially if the efforts by land were well seconded with a diversion on the coast of France by our navy. But Mr. PITT was so attached to British measures, that he could not be brought, as yet, to acquiesce in this duplicate plan of engaging the French ministry, and to distract their councils. His plan was to keep our regular forces in a condition to supply the demands of our colonies and settlements in the prosecution of the war, and to protect these kingdoms from all insults; and so to employ our navy, as to protect our coasts, to ruin the navigation and commerce of the enemy, and to weaken the strength of France in Germany.

Another squadron, consisting of the Nassau of 64 guns, the Flamingo of 50 guns, and the Rye of

A. D.
1757

Argo-
mean for a German war.

subseq.
to the
war.

of

A.D.
1731WHA
THE HISTORICAL NEWExpedition on against Senegal.

Sail.

Arrives.

of 24 guns, attended by the Swan Sloop and two barges, were dispatched to the coast of Africa
under the command of Captain Morris, having on board 200 marines, under Major Mason, and a detachment of minuettes, under Captain Walker.
By this armament the minister had two things in view, 1st to defend that lucrative trade from the incroachments and depredations of the enemy, who had, in the preceding years, shown a very strong propensity to wrest the African coast out of our hands; and 2^d to try, if a scheme laid before him by certain merchants of London, to surprise and to drive the French from their settlements on the river Senegal, and from the island of Goree,
by which they monopolized the gum trade, so necessary and advantageous to our manufactures,
was practicable.

This little squadron sailed from Plymouth with but noise and without suspicion, on the 9th of March; and arrived, without any accident or attention in its fringing coast, at the mouth of the river of Senegal on the 24th of April. But it was the 24th before they could get over the bar, and then not without the loss of the two small boats, the want of water, which loss of the small craft obliged the commander to retreat some of the way to the east side of the river, in the Senegal country. The enemy with seven vessels, three

Before this time the French admitted no nation to trade on this river. They put what price they pleased on gum, and all to the Dutch; and the English were obliged to buy it of those Dutch, or what they could get of the Senegals.

of which were armed with 10 guns each, made a shew of attacking our small craft, and kept a kind of running fire; but were soon repulsed and obliged to retire. Seven hundred natives and seamen being landed, and the artillery got ashore, the men laid on their arms all night, and were prepared to attack Fort Lewis, the strongest post on that river, situate on an island about 12 miles within the bar; when a flag of truce was hung out, and deputies arrived in our camp from the superior council of Senegal, with articles upon which they offered to capitulate.

The capitulation was agreed to without much variation. By which the English were put in possession of all the forts, storehouses, vessels, arms, provision, and every thing belonging to the company upon the river Senegal. All the white people belonging to the Senegal company were allowed to carry away their private effects, and to be sent in six weeks time to Old France. But the merchandise and uncoined treasure were excepted. And the free Mulattoes or Negroes were to enjoy their religion, liberty and effects, and to continue on the spot or remove with their effects, according to their own good liking.

Agreeable to this capitulation, the French soldiers laid down their arms, on the 1st of May, and our men entered and took possession of the fort, and of all the vessels in the river; got the keys of the store, papers, &c. and proceeded to receive the submission of all the French on the

A. D. river, which in general accepted the terms of capitulation.
1758.

Importance of this conquest.

The importance of this conquest is collected from its produce, its benefit to England and its loss to the enemy. At this time the Senegal factory, as called by the French, supplied the company in Old France with about 500 slaves, 4000 hides, 1200 quintals of gum, and 20 quintals of Elephants teeth. To this factory were belonging five more: viz. Galem, which supplied about 600 slaves, 20 quintals of teeth, and fifty marks of gold: Goree, 400 slaves and 2400 hides: Joal, 100 slaves, 40 hides and 10 quintals of teeth: Gambia, 400 slaves, 200 quintals of wax, and 200 quintals of teeth: Bisseaux, 250 slaves, 250 quintals of wax, and 250 quintals of teeth.

Peculiar
advantages.

The benefit arising from this conquest to England is manifold. It puts us in possession of the gum trade, and makes us the merchants of that drug, at our own price, to all Europe; which we were obliged to purchase with ready money, and a great balance against us from France and Holland. It also opens new branches of commerce, and establishes the interest and reputation of this kingdom, all along the African coast, which was declining before, and must, in a short time, have yielded to the intrigues and power of France.

Loss to France.

The loss to France was very great. It deprived her of the means of supplying her colonies with slaves. It cut off a considerable branch of those resources she stood in need of to support the war. It deprived her of a lucrative traffic in her own manufactures; and obliged her to seek with ready money the merchandize, that had been the produce of her own settlements. Which must both raise the price of French manufactures, and turn the balance of trade against them, in those goods which can be made and finished without ivory and gum senega.

A. D.
1758.

While

The French African trade, under the title of the Senegal company, was incorporated with the East-India company in 1718. The director-general for this united company resided on the island Senegal, about 12 miles up the river, which is little better than a bank of white sand, about three English miles long, and not more than 400 yards broad. The gums are gathered twice a year, in December and March. They begin to trade in February, before the first gathering, and continue till May; their second trade begins in April, and holds till June. The Moors that sell the gum, are called Auladeibagi, in the Arabick tongue, and Darnecanos, in the negroes; their chiefs are called chams, who lay a duty of an eighth, upon all the gums the French buy. They trade at these places, for 1200 quintals of gum, weighing 450lb. each. The other goods sold at these two principal ports, are about 300 oxen, and 400 sheep, some ambergrease and ostrich feathers; 60 packs of feathers are worth a quintal of gum. At the neighbouring places of Senegal, they purchase a quantity of millet, with which they feed the negroes, as well those in the company's service, as those they transport; and even sometimes the French were glad of it themselves. When the waters are out, they trade to the adjacent lakes, at some of which they get ebony, at others ivory, pease, hides, and sometimes ambergrease. There are fixed times and seasons for buying and selling for the service of the company of Senegal, as well as the curing and hides, and named times for buying provisions. But the best observation, is the time and place of going out to the river, which is between April and July, after which the season begins, and the waters are out.

A.D.
1758.Care of Germany.

While these expeditions against North America and the coast of Africa were sitting out, and every circumspection taken to secure success, our allies had no room to complain of neglect of their interest and defence. As soon as the parliament met pursuant to their adjournment after Christmas, Mr. PITT presented the following message to the house of commons.

GEORGE R.

His Majesty's
message.

HIS Majesty having ordered the army formed last year in his electoral dominions, to be put again into motion from the 20th of November inst, and to act with the utmost

The old company of Senegal had a fort at Galam, built in 1700, but was carried away by the rapidity of the river. The new company afterwards built another, a league lower, where they now traded.

They traded chiefly at Galam, in negroes, gold and ivory.

The island of Gorée is the centre of the company's settlements, and it is there the slaves are kept, till they have a sufficient number, or till they have ships ready to transport them to their ill-fate.

The river Senegal empties itself into the Atlantic ocean in lat. 16 deg. north. The entrance of it is guarded by several forts, the principal of which is Fort Lewis, built on an island of the same name. The English had formerly settlements here, out of which they were driven by the French, who had engrossed the whole trade from Cape Blanco to the river Gambia, which is now 200 miles. The Dutch were the first who settled at Senegal, and built two forts. The French soon afterwards arrived at that place, and after the English had taken it, but were soon driven from there, and had long been over face.

vigour against the common enemy, in concert with his good brother and ally the King of Prussia, and the exhausted and ruined state of that electorate, and of its revenues, having rendered it impossible for the same to maintain and keep together that army, until the further necessary charge thereof, as well as the more particular measures now concerting for the effectual support of the King of Prussia, can be laid before this house; his Majesty, relying on the constant zeal of his faithful Commons, for the support of the Protestant religion, and of the liberties of Europe, against the dangerous designs of France and her confederates, finds himself, in the mean time, under the absolute necessity of recommending to this House the speedy consideration of such a present supply, as may enable his Majesty, in this critical exigency, to sustain and keep together the said army.

In consequence of this message 100,000*l.* was unanimously granted; to be taken immediately out of the supplies of last year unapplied, and to be remitted with all possible dispatch.

However unanimous the senate was in the resolution for this grant; it was said, and justly said, without doors, that this was engaging the nation in a German war; yet there was not that universal dislike; nay, there did rather a general inclination appear in all ranks of people to support a measure, which at any other time, and under

A. D.
1756.

and
the
the
the
the
the
the

How received by the parliament,

by the nation,

A. D.
1758.

another administration, would have disgusted the whole nation.

But at this time every one saw, that there was no jobb intended by a German connection. The cause was real: the necessity absolute. The greatest powers in Europe were leagued with our natural enemy, to pull down and ruin our allies and our interest on the continent. England must support Prussia, and defend Hanover, or both must fall: and should they fall under the dominion or influence of France, her power would grow more terrible and dangerous to Great Britain. So that when Mr. PITT saw that these would certainly be the fatal effects, except England should interpose on the behalf of Prussia and Hanover, he was driven to this alternative, either to quit the helm of the administration, which would have been a desertion of his country, when she stood most in need of his wisdom, vigour and integrity, and must have been ruined by falling back into the measures of former administrations; or he must so far acquiesce with such of his Majesty's servants, as were attached to Germanic measures, as to make them subservient to the interest of Great Britain, in the course of her war with France in America.

Here was a strong conflict between the duty which he owed to his Sovereign, enforced by the apparent ruin of his country's interest on the continent of Europe, and the principles which he had plighted to the people. Mr. PITT had long opposed German measures. He had opposed till he

Reasons
for Mr.
PITT's
acquiescence to German
measures.

saw

law opposition was vain; and that it was impossible for him to serve his country in other parts of the world, and to pursue the interest of England with advantage, unless he would sacrifice some points and some opinions to Germany. He further saw, that unanimity could never be established in the King's council, while he adhered to British measures only. He was convinced, that Britain must be inevitably connected with Germany, as long as the same person is King of England and Elector of Hanover.

When we excluded the family of Stuarts from the throne, we cast our eyes round Europe for a Sovereign; but there was no Prince of the Protestant religion, who had no foreign dominions. What then must we have done?—have submitted to absolute government, been torn to pieces by a civil war, or chuse a King, who had political interests? It was thought best to chuse the latter, however distinct those interests might be from the good of this nation. If this misfortune was inevitable in its cause, it was impossible to prevent its being the same in its effect. Therefore, the evil of keeping considerable armies in Germany is (in some measure) ingrafted in the establishment. Without doubt, it is the wish of all true Englishmen, that the crown had no territory out of this island, that our strength might be kept within it. But secondary causes have disposed of things otherwise, and how shall we alter them? Nothing but an alienation of Hanover. For so long as the same person is King of Great Britain

A. D. and Elector of Hanover, the evil will not be removed.

His maxim.

This channel being unavoidable, the only thing that a patriot minister could do was, what he engaged, to make it serviceable to Britain. A short consideration pointed out the method. It was not to be effected by the puny effort of a parliamentary grant of 100,000*l*. His maxim was, either do nothing, or to do it heartily and effectually. The attention and troops of France was to be drawn as much as possible that way, to make her employ more troops in Germany than was consistent with her interest in America, and the support of her marine, in order to furnish future opportunities for attacking her settlements abroad, and thereby cut off the resources of her riches and power both by sea and land.

The difficulty laid in filling up this outline, many steps were required, before this great end could be accomplished. Since it was impossible to separate Britain from the continent, those engagements entered into by the former administration were to be cemented in a stronger manner. The confederacy against the King of Prussia being too powerful for him, he, in all probability, if not supported by England, would be crushed, as understood in his Majesty's message to the House, and if he fell, France would instantly fall like a ripe ear of wheat. The latter was the tender point, and as a peace it must be regained, that as the consequence of British conquests.

Reasons for aiding our allies.

According to this system, which every one knows was the system of this time we are treating of, it was the interest of Britain to support the existence of Prussia, and to reinforce the allied army with British troops; therefore, in order to ruin the Gallie scheme, which was to make a conquest of Hanover, and with that conquest to purchase whatever the superiority of the British navy might acquire, "the support of Prussia, and the defence of Hanover, became objects of the second importance."

A. R.
1719.Unanimous in support of Prussia.

The people of England were unanimous in their desire of supporting the King of Prussia: the éclat of his victories had gained their esteem. They demonstrated their regard for him on his birth-day with a solemnity and rejoicing equal to those of the most beloved Sovereign. It was the time when this vein of zeal was fired with the warmest blood, that Mr. Pitt adopted German measures conformable to the sense of the nation. He saw it was the present juncture that would favour a treaty with Prussia: and he was convinced that such a treaty was the only method to distress the French in Germany. This is not alleged to vindicate that treaty, which afterwards we shall see made with Prussia; because we have just before explained the political motives, which induced him to sign it, and the views which he had of drawing an advantage from it, but to show what a happy concurrence of events there was to warp the people to German measures, and to continue the most favourable opinion of the minister,

Pitt
now
advised.

A. D. 1758. ministry, in whose known honesty, vigilance and well-meaning they still reposed unlimited confidence.

Countenanced by parliament

This grant and countenance of the House of Commons, may therefore be said to bring on those close connections with which Great Britain and Prussia soon after were joined by treaty, and the measures taken by the British ministry, in consequence thereof. — This treaty, which was signed at London on the 16th of April 1758, sets forth in the preamble, the intention of that former treaty between their Majesties, signed on the 26th of January 1756, to preserve the general peace of Europe, and of Germany in particular, the hostilities committed in the Empire and against their Majesties and their allies, by the French, and their incitement of other powers to act in like manner: the burthensome expence that was had brought upon his Prussian Majesty, and the diminution of his revenues, in such of his dominions as were become the seat of war: the mutual resolution of their Majesties, to continue their efforts for reciprocal defence and security, for recovery of their possessions, for the protection of their allies, and the preservation of the liberties of the Germanic body, &c. &c. And then stipulates (1.) That his Britannic Majesty shall pay the sum of 4,000,000 German crowns, which is 670,000 l. of English money, to the King of Prussia's agent in London, immediately after the ratifications shall be exchanged; (2.) That his Prussian Majesty shall employ this sum in augmenting and keeping up his

Treaty with
Prussia.

his forces, which shall act as may be most for the interest of the common cause; and (3.) That neither of the contracting powers shall conclude any peace, make any truce, or enter into any treaty of neutrality, of what kind soever, without the participation of the other.

By the parties that signed this treaty, it should appear to be carried in the privy council with unanimity. The house of parliament approved of this convention, when it was laid before them; on the 20th of the same month, they granted the money thereby engaged for the support of the King of Prussia; and the people, in general, were satisfied with its contents; except a few, who branded this gravity with the appellation of a trick, "in the payment of which the honour and the interest of the nation, said they, were scandalously prostituted."

Let

The parties empowered to sign, and did actually sign this treaty on the part of Great Britain, were Sir Robert Henley, Att. Gen. Keeper of the Great Seal of Great Britain; John Earl of Glasgow, President of his Majesty's Council; Thomas Norton, Duke of Newcastle, First Lord Commissioner of the Treasury; Robert, Earl of Holderness, one of his Majesty's Principal Secretaries of State; Philip, Earl of Hardwicke; and William Pitt, Esq; another of his Majesty's Principal Secretaries of State.

The sum stipulated, by this convention, to be paid by Great Britain, has been branded with the appellation of a trick, in the payment of which the honour and interest of the nation were scandalously prostituted. This is a licence of diffusion, which at once vilifies the King, Lords and Commons, of prostituting their power and authority, and of

"can-

A. D. 1757. Let us for the first step in consequence of this convention: a grand expedition, to be executed by combining in a measure to dishonour and ruin the nation.

How supported by Mr. PITT.

 " Let us examine this allegation.—A tribute!—This is a " token of bondage. Did the British parliament, when they
 " granted an annual supply of money to the King of Prussia,
 " give any reason to suspect, that otherwise they surrendered
 " to him their liberty, lives and fortunes? or did they act, as " if they made that obligation through fear of what might be " dreaded from the progress of his arms; or through that
 " magnanimous principle of succouring the distressed; of main" taining a balance of power, for which England has always " been celebrated; and of favouring our national interest?
 " Did the King of Prussia, in consideration of that annual " payment, stipulate and agree to enter into no secret or sepa-
 " rate treaty of peace detrimental to the interest, and without
 " the consent of Great Britain? and to keep the sword drawn
 " against our enemies, till his domestic Majesty should give " him leave to sheath it by an honourable peace;—in all
 " which there does not appear any thing like slavery or tri" bute on the part of Britain.—How such a treaty with the " King of Prussia can be justified, and the foundation proli-
 " ferated to his honour and interest of the nation, is unjust,
 " as it is inconsistent. Was it beneath the dignity of the " King of Great Britain to enter into an alliance with a Prin" ce who was at the time, for his valour and for his
 " magnanimity, the champion of the Empire? Was it consistent to be re" sponsibly by a parcel of gentlemen, who the number of
 " the hands of Prussia and Russia, allied by Sweden, Swe" den, and other powers, threatened immediate destruction to
 " the British Empire, and the dominion of Europe, which
 " it would multiply their followers, and conquering souls of our " friends, and the way, British of ourselves and even
 " to ourselves, if it should be necessary to us, and to our
 " the last, and the other, and the other, and the other, and the other,
 " application of justice, which says, Prussia is not a

by two squadrons and a respectable body of land forces, was immediately set a foot, to try what might be done in this method; to divide and weaken the enemy's forces, and to make a diversion in favour of our German allies, by forcing the French to employ their troops in the defence of their own coasts; to destroy their navigation and trade, and thereby to cut off the source of their riches, and the sinews of the war.

One squadron consisted of four ships of the line, seven frigates, six sloops, two fire-ships, two bombs, two cutters, twenty tenders, ten store-ships and one hundred transports; and the command thereof was given to Commodore Howe, who had signalized himself for his bravery and conduct, in the late fruitless expedition. The other squadron of twenty great ships, was commanded by Lord Anson and Sir Edward Hawke.

Two squadrons, with land forces, sent against the French coast.

The land forces* destined for this expedition were 15 battalions, 400 of the artillery, 540 light horse:

"state of uncertainty, dependance, and expense, that disabled her from a vigorous pursuit of her natural and national interest, and crowned our expeditions every where with success. This subsidy has nothing new in its constitution. It was of no other kind, than what not only Britain, but other nations, particularly France, has always made use of, to secure an interest to herself, and to deprive her neighbours of further means of strength. Of this kind have been several barbarous princes, who were always held in subjection to the nation which paid them for their miserable service, and for holding their possessions in a state of tributary subjection."

* General, Field, Foot, and Cavalry regiments. Commanded by General Dury.

Field

A.D. 1758. horse: in all, about 13,000 fighting men, 60 pieces of cannon and 50 pieces of the mortar-kind, under the command of the Duke of Marl-

First brigade. Bentinck, Manners, Talbot and Home's regiment, by General Mofyn.

Third brigade. Welch fusiliers, Lambton's and Lord Charles Haye's regiments, by General Boscawen.

Fourth brigade. Easingham, Duke of Richmond and Cornwallis's regiments, by General Elliot.

The Artillery.

Second brigade. London, Wolf, and Kingley's regiments, by Waldgrave.

Staff Officers.

The Duke of Marlborough, Lord George Sackville, Earl of Ancram, lieutenant-generals.

Waldgrave, Mofyn, Drury, Boscawen and Elliot, major-generals.

Brigadier Elliot, commanding the light horse.

Lieutenant-Colonel Hotham, adjutant-general.

Captain Watton, quarter-master-general, with the rank of lieutenant-colonel.

Aids de Camp.

To the Duke of Marlborough. Captain Culcraft, of Hodgson's; Captain Lloyd, of the Welch fusiliers; Captain Paterson, of the artillery.

To Lord George Sackville. Captain Smith, of the third regiment of guards; Captain Boyer, of Jeffrey's; Captain Broom, of the artillery.

To Lord Ancram. Captain Blacquier, of Lambton's; Ensign Meadows, of the first regiment of guards.

To General Drury. Captain Howard, of the first regiment of guards.

To General Mofyn. Captain Veach, of Wolf's.

To General Waldgrave. Captain Wilson, of the King's own.

To General Boscawen. Ensign Bishop, of the guards.

To General Elliot. Ensign Pencil, of the second regiment of guards.

Fifteen of which were twenty-four pounders.

HIS GRACE CHARLES SPENCER
DUKE OF MARLBOROUGH.

borough, grandson to the Duke of that title, who A. D.
1758. in his days was a real scourge to France, and the glory of his own country; but though the grandson was brave without exception, he can't be complimented with inheriting the martial genius of that English Cæsar, who never lost a battle, nor raised a siege. However, Lord George Sackville, son to the Duke of Devon, the second in command, did not want much military knowledge or experience in the art of war.

The fleet rendezvoused at Spithead: the army encamped on the Isle of Wight. The troops began to embark on the 25th of May, and the whole embarkation was completed on the 31st. On the 1st of June Mr. Flinders sent about sixteen frigates and independent vessels to every ship. The wind would not permit them to sail till the first of June: but in the mean time the Duke of Marlborough distributed his orders concerning the manner in which the troops were to land, and the measures that were to be taken by the troops as they came on shore. The destination of this prodigious armament was not yet published; and its secrecy, as well as force, filled the enemy with great terror and alarm.

The miscarriage of his former plans ^a having been attributed to the too early intelligence thereof, received by the enemy, and the detection and apprehending of a spy ^b at this juncture, required him

^a See p. 320, &c. Vol. II.

^b This spy was one Florence Hensley, an Irishman by birth, educated at Leyden, where he commenced M. D. and had a compe-

THE GENERAL HISTORY OF

A.D. 1758. high to proceed with the utmost precaution and secrecy.

a competent knowledge of the French, Spanish, Portuguese and Italian tongues. He was a Roman Catholic, and his brother was a Jesuit, chaplain and under secretary to the Spanish ambassador at the Hague, and the author of those letters intitled, the Voice of Peace, managed most artfully in favour of France, and published in the year 1761.

This Florence Henfey appeared in London under the character of a physician, and pretended that his correspondence with the ministers of his king and country, arose from an accidental acquaintance with one formerly his fellow student, who was, at that time, employed in the secretary of state's office at Paris, for foreign affairs. To whom Doctor Henfey wrote, among other things, a request of his service in any manner he might want at London. Which his French correspondent, in his answer, interpreting to be a political service, and assuring him, that his diligence therein might be advantageous to them both; the doctor, in his second letter, commended his friend's discernment, saying, "That if he could obtain for him a suitable recompence, he would endeavour to make his intelligence of the utmost importance." This produced a salary of 1200 livres, or 25 l. sterling per quarter for the doctor, with directions to procure and send lists of all his Majesty's ships in and out of commission, number of guns and men, their time of sailing, from what port; their destination, the names of the commanders; the state of the land forces, where quartered and garrisoned; plans of all fortifications in Great Britain and North America; and the earliest account of enterprizes or expeditions against France.

The course of this correspondence was settled by the way of Cologne, Hague and Bern, to be forwarded from those cities to Paris: It was a common letter, wrote with ink, containing the secret correspondence written between the lines with black-juice. This was packed under some other cover, directed to the several persons entrusted with the secret.

On the first of June, about break of day, Lord A. D.
Anson made a signal for the fleet to unmoor, and 1758
he

who conveyed them from one hand to another, till the first inclosed came to the principal, for whom it was designed.— But such as he deemed of greatest importance, he directed to his brother at the Hague, for greater safety. The doctor tried every means to gain intelligence, that might recommend him to a larger salary. His address and profession gained him admission into polite company, without giving any suspicion, and introduced him into clubs or meetings where some gentlemen, about court, were too liberal in retailing their knowledge, or their conjectures on the measures of their superiors.

This correspondence began soon after Mr. PIERCE was first called up to the administration, and continued, without any material interruption, till the 9th of March 1758, and perhaps might have remained a secret, had it not been for the deep penetration of the English resident at the Hague, who having frequent intelligence of affairs, transacting at the court of London, from the Spanish ambassador's under-secretary, before he received any account thereof from his own court, was staggered, and put upon the enquiry which way the Jesuit's knowledge could be communicated. He found that the Jesuit had this brother, and that discovery naturally suggested a suspicion sufficient to make him narrowly watched. Twenty-nine of his letters were stopped by proper authority: and he at length was waylaid on a Sunday, as he came from the Spanish ambassador's chapel, by two messengers, seized by them in St. Martin's Lane, and committed to Newgate.

His lodgings in Arundel-street were searched, where several copies of his letters were found, as well as the originals he had received from abroad. By those papers it appeared, That he gave the French the first account of Admiral Boscawen's departure for North America, and of the taking the Alcide and Lys, and of every minute circumstance relating to it; and from that time, of the sailing of every fleet, and of its destination;

A. D. 1756. he sailed immediately with twenty-two ships of the line. About noon, the frigates under the command destination; and was so particular to mention the launch of a man of war. He gave a particular account of the difficulties the ministry met with in raising money; and of his connection with a society in the Strand, who were reputed great men in the political world, and particularly in the financial branch. In one of these letters, dated the 20th of July 1757, the expedition against Rochefort was notified, though it is certain that resolution of the council had not then been made known either to Admiral Hawke or to Sir John Mordaunt, the commanders in chief; and in another letter, dated at Twickenham, the doctor, after giving an exact account of the state of our affairs, the condition of our fleet and army, their disposition, how many ships guarded and how many troops lined the coast of England, concludes with observing, "That the only means of preventing the success of the expedition against Rochefort, would be to make a powerful diversion upon the coast of England; that by thus attacking us in our very vitals, we might be engaged at home, and be prevented from sending any number of troops abroad sufficient to give them any real annoyance." Which advice he renewed in a subsequent letter, alleging, "That it would be the most certain method to distress the government, as it would affect public credit;" and then pointed out both the time and place, when and where it would be most proper to carry it into execution.

By what channel this spy procured this knowledge, has not yet transpired; but the early intelligence, and the minute circumstances of Admiral Holbourne's destination for America, communicated to the court of France a few days after that Admiral's instructions were signed, and in which he was to exact as to give the number of ships and troops on board, the day of their departure, &c. induced a shrewd suspicion of his connections with somebody, besides what he could gather in public conversation; and the favour he met with after condemnation, afforded much speculation concerning his private mind of Mr. Howe, together with all the transports, got under way. Lord Anson, with his squadron, stood away to the west: but Mr. Howe's fleet quite athwart the channel, with the wind

 at south-east, and soon lost sight of Lord Anson;
 whose instructions were to watch and intercept any squadron from the west against Mr. Howe's. The weather changing to very tempestuous, the commodore, a little before midnight, made a signal for the fleet to lie too, lest it should run too close in with the French shore before break of day. But no accident happened, except that one of the transports rolled away her foremast, and was obliged to be taken in tow by one of the frigates.
 They made sail at six in the morning, and by eight they could see Cape La Hogue. The fleet stood in between the continent and the Isle of Alderney, and came to an anchor in the Race, in the evening;

A. D.
 1758.

connections in England: where the time has been, when no matter how much, and by what instrument, the nation suffers, so that some men could maintain their own power by disgracing their rivals in the state.

For this illicit correspondence with the enemy of our country, in time of open war, Doctor Hensley was tried, convicted and condemned to be hanged and quartered, as in cases of high treason; but after several reprieves, he obtained his Majesty's pardon, not for any discovery, as the world were made to believe; but by an extraordinary foreign interposition, which would not have had the same weight at a court that properly refused the disappointments the nation met with in the expeditions against Louisbourg and Rochefort. Enough to put the minister, who was to direct the affairs of the nation, upon the utmost caution to cover his intentions, till he could bring them into action.

A. D.
1758.

Arrives in Cancalle
bay.

where many of their ships were driven from their anchors by the rapidity of the current, and some of them, that rode it out, left a fluke in the rocky ground, when they came to weigh. The fleet was stopped next day by a transport's running and bulging upon a hidden rock, with part of the guards on board, who, notwithstanding the diligence and expedition with which they were supplied by boats, from the rest of the ships, which on that occasion came to an anchor, had much to do to save themselves and baggage. It was eight at night before the fleet could proceed, and next day, about five in the afternoon, being becalmed, it dropt anchor within three leagues from St. Maloes, on the 4th of June. Next morning they weighed before day, and proceeded to the Bay of Cancalle, where they were to land at a village of the same name.

Forces
land.

Three frigates were ordered to continue their course to a battery, that might impede the disembarkation. But the rest of the fleet brought up. Having given orders for the ships carrying the grenadiers, to make sail with the frigates, Mr. Howe quitted the Essex, and went on board, with his pendant, one of the frigates, in which he was able to lie closer in shore than in a large ship. The battery, perceiving the grenadiers in the flat-bottomed boats, prepared to land, fired upon them: but the frigates advanced, silenced the battery, and the grenadiers made good their landing, without much opposition. For, though there were seven companies of foot, and three troops of dragoons goons posted at the landing-place, they fled with precipitation as soon as our soldiers began to move towards the shore; and nothing then appeared to impede our progress but a few peasants, that drew up behind a wind-mill at a great distance, and diverted themselves with firing shot, that would not reach our men.

A. D.
1758.

The grenadiers being drawn up upon the beach, Lord Down, with twenty of Kingsley's, marched through a very narrow pass, up into the village of Cancalle; where they were met by the Marquis of Landal, intendant of the coast and colonel of the militia, with his servant. Lord Down called to him and told him, if he would surrender, he had nothing to fear: but he and his servant foolishly refused quarter; so that both they and their horses were shot dead upon the spot. My Lord took possession of the village, disarmed and secured the most active peasants that fell in his way, and kept his men on their arms all night, waiting for the rest of the army.

Three regiments disembarked that same tide as the grenadiers, but they continued all night on the beach; and the whole army was landed the next day, the 6th, and encamped. The grenadiers and light horse advanced about a mile in the front of the line, and Cancalle was made the head-quarters. Next morning, the 7th, by break

Encamp.

¹ The inhabitants of Cancalle fled, and left their village to the mercy of the invaders: and it was plundered by the soldiers and sailors; for which one soldier was hanged, and seven seamen flogged, and sent on board their ships.

A. D.
1758.

March for
St. Maloes

of day, the whole army, except the third brigade, struck their tents, and began to march in two columns. The first column, consisting of the brigade of guards, two battalions of grenadiers, and the first brigade, commanded by Lord George Sackville, marching from the left, fell into the great road to St. Maloes. The second column, under the command of Lieutenant-General Earl of Anseram, and consisting of the second and fourth brigade, marched also from the left, through a very inclosed country, and most narrow road; for, though 200 pioneers marched at the head of the column, and laboured hard to clear the way, the men were frequently obliged to pass by single files; and the lands on each side the road were so covered with wood, that they could seldom see above forty yards clear of their flanks. The villages, through which they past, were totally deserted by man, woman and child: who had carried off every thing valuable.

The third brigade had orders to continue encamped at Cantele, and to throw up entrenchments to secure a retreat, in case of need, and to escort the heavy artillery, which was not yet landed. But the guards were ordered to file off about two miles to the left of the first encampment, and there to pitch their tents, and cover the army, on that quarter, from whence there was the greatest reason to expect an enemy^a.

The

^a The following is a translation of a manifesto, which his Grace the Duke of Marlborough published in Bretagne, on

The troops in motion, advanced towards St. Malo, without beat of drum, and in as good order as the 7th of June, the second day after the landing of the troops at Cancele.
A. D. 1758.

"We the high and mighty Prince, Charles, Duke of Marlborough, Marquis of Blandford, Earl of Sunderland, Baron Churchill, Knight of the most noble order of the Garter, Privy Counsellor to his Britannic Majesty, Great Master of the Ordnance, and commander in chief of his forces, &c.

Make known to all the inhabitants of Bretagne, that the descent on their coast, with the powerful army under our command, and our formidable armament by sea, is not made with an intention to make war on the inhabitants of the country, excepting those, who shall be found in arms, or shall otherwise oppose the just war, which we wage against his Majesty the most Christian King.

"Be it known, therefore, to all who will remain in peaceable possession of their habitations and effects, that they may stay unmolested in their respective dwellings, and follow their usual occupations; and that, excepting the customs and taxes, which they pay to the King, nothing will be required of them, either in money or merchandize, but what is absolutely necessary for the subsistence of the army; and that for all the provisions they shall bring in they shall be paid ready money.

"On the contrary, if, notwithstanding this declaration, which we have been pleased to make, the inhabitants of the towns or villages carry away their furniture, effects, or provisions, and abandon their houses or dwellings, we shall treat such delinquents as enemies, and destroy by fire and sword, or such other methods, as shall be in our power, their towns, villages, dwellings, or houses. Given at the head-quarters at Paris.

June 7, 1758.

MARLBOROUGH."

By his Grace's command,

BRYANT.

A. D. 1758. as the nature of the country would permit; but it was late in the evening before they had marched six miles. The commanders in chief proceeded immediately to reconnoitre the situation of St. Maloes; ordered the ground for the camp to be marked out, at a little more than a mile from the town. This camp was formed in the village of Parame, made the head-quarters, in front, and the village of Servant upon the right flank. The grenadiers advanced about 100 paces, the light horse and artillery about as far in the rear, and the rest of the troops were extended in one direct line.

Camp before St. Maloes.

While the main body was employed in pitching tents, the light horse, sustained by the piquets of the whole, advanced to the walls of St. Maloes; and

His Grace sent at the same time the following letter to the magistrates and echevins of St. Maloes.

GENTLEMEN,

"We being in possession of all the country between Dinan, Rennes, and Dol, as far as St. Maloes, and finding that all the inhabitants of the towns and villages, in this extent of country, have abandoned their habitations; probably to avoid the payment of the usual contributions; and as we are informed that the inhabitants have, by your orders, been compelled to go to St. Maloes; we give you notice, that if they do not return peaceably to their houses, and send their magistrates to our head-quarters to settle the contributions, we shall think ourselves obliged to set fire to them without further delay."

MARLBOROUGH."

St. Maloes is one of the chief towns and ports of the Upper Bretagne, it is situated on the northern coast of St. Audoen, and and were saluted by the enemy's cannon from the ramparts, which killed a horse or two without any other loss or damage. But by favour of the night they got under the enemy's cannon, and slipped down to the harbour, where they found a considerable fleet of privateers and merchantmen², to which our troops set fire, with combustibles provided and carried with them for that purpose; and also to the magazines of pitch, tar, ropes, &c. which took effect. So that in the space of a few hours there was the most dreadful scene of conflagration that imagination can paint, and all the ships and stores were destroyed by the flames, which continued all night, without the least opposition from the garrison; though there was a considerable body of troops in the town, that might enable them to make a sally with a view of success.

A. D.
1758.

Ships, &c.
burnt.

Met with no opposition.

joined to the continent by means of a long causeway, of not above thirty fathoms broad; the entrance whereof is defended by a strong castle, flanked with large towers, and the town surrounded with walls, deep ditches, and a sufficient garrison: besides which, towards the sea it is secured by a shoal of sand that encompasses it, and several rocks and small islands, that make the haven of difficult access, inasmuch that it is reputed one of the keys of France. It is considerable for its traffic and strength, and the skill of its inhabitants in maritime affairs, by which means great numbers of privateers are in time of war from hence fitted out, and much disturb the trade of these seas. See p. 91.

² One man of war of 50 guns on the stocks, two ditto 36 guns each, twenty-four privateers, from 36 to 40 guns each. Seventy merchantmen, and forty small craft. There was only one ship, a privateer of forty guns saved, she being a float; the rest were hauled up imprudently to the walls, and were destroyed.

Their

A. D.
1758.

Forage.

Retire.

Their next care was to secure provisions. So that when this party was returned from the conflagration to the camp, other parties were next morning, on the 8th, sent on forage, and to bring in the necessaries of life; the country people refusing to supply our troops for ready money, and the provisions brought a short being expended.

One battalion of guards, and Lord Charles Hay's of the third brigade, marched the same day into camp. One mortar and three royals, which had been ordered from the ships, were stopped on the road, and remanded on board; and the advanced piquets and the second brigade, returned to camp about nine in the evening. The night proved a most terrible one, with thunder, lightning, violent rain and wind, which beat down the tents and souled the men as if they had been dipped in water. But at seven next morning 200 pioneers sustained by a party of 500 men, were ordered to march towards St. Maloes; and a captain and 80 men were employed to level the ground in the front of the encampment, in order to open a communication between each regiment. These were indications of vigorous resolutions. Yet, on the 10th, in the morning, His Grace the Duke of Marlborough, having advice of a great superiority of forces assembling to attack him, and to cut off his retreat, ordered the whole army back to Cancele, which was done; though it did not appear that there were at that present time above 500 regular forces in that province. They struck their tents about noon, immediately marched off, and

and encamped that night within the entrenchments at that village: giving over all thoughts of a siege, which would take up a month, in a regular manner; and for which they were not sufficiently provided. For the walls of the town were not only of a vast thickness, but of so great an height, that none of the scaling-ladders sent from England could reach the top.

A. D.
1758.

The same night the artillery was put on board; and the two following days were employed in the re-imbarkation of the troops in the midst of a very heavy rain, which filled the trenches, of those that were left, half full of water.

Re-imbark.

Thus ended the attempt against St. Maloes, with the loss of 30 men missing. Whilst the army was employed before St. Maloes, a battalion of guards marched, under the command of Colonel Cesar, 12 miles up into the country, to a town called Dol, and were politely entertained by the magistrates, and their treatment was as politely repaid by this party, whose intension was only to reconnoitre the country, and returned after staying in this town one night, without committing one act of hostility. A party of light horse advanced still farther, and fell in with the videts of a French camp, chased them a long way, and brought two of them into our camp.

Having

We may guess at the consternation and confusion of the enemy from this abstract of a mandate issued by the Bishop of St. Maloes, for a solemn procession by way of thanksgiving, for the retreat of the English.

Sing

A.D.
1718.

Weigh
anchor.

Having mustered the men on board, orders were issued on the 14th for the grenadiers and guards to hold themselves in readiness to disembark, to complete their ammunition for that purpose, and that the officers should, for the future, take more effectual means to prevent marauding. It was intended to proceed against Gratville, a petty town, situated on the top of a high cliff, on the other side of the bay, and about six leagues distant from St. Maloes, defended by a battery of Sing unto the Lord with timbrels, sing unto the Lord with cymbals, &c. For God breaketh the battles: for amongst the camps in the midst of the people he hath delivered me out of the hands of them that persecuted me.

—Bethulla, being reduced to the last extremity, without resource, without any hopes of assistance, and when its frightened inhabitants desired nothing but a voluntary surrender, was saved by one of those extraordinary miracles, which manifest in the most obvious manner the operation of the almighty hand of the Most High. Your deliverance, on the contrary, has, at first sight, nothing in it but what is natural; but whoever gives but a little attention to the whole series of this event, must acknowledge the most evident marks of God's special protection of this city. — You took all the precaution, which courage and conduct could dictate, against the attacks with which you were threatened, and which you looked upon as inevitable. These precautions were superfluous. There was not so much as an gun fired against your city. You hoped the troops coming to your assistance would drive away the enemy: but the enemy did not wait for them. News was brought them, and they retired with precipitation. The winds opposed their return: but it was decreed by Providence that they should return by the same way that they came; and they have done it in spite of contrary winds. What shall we then say? Is God for us, who shall be against us?

18 pieces of cannon, upon a neck of land, which commands the town, and a great part of the bay. A.D. 1758.
 Pilots were taken on board from Guernsey and Jersey, and 22 large lug-sail boats were also brought from thence, for greater expedition in the landing of the forces. But having weighed at 6 in the morning, on the 16th, the fleet was obliged by contrary and violent winds to come to an anchor that evening off St. Maloes; and next day to return to Canaille bay. The winds continued contrary, and the weather very bad till the 21st, when it growing moderate, they put to sea, were joined by the Isis, Captain Wheeler, and four transports with reinforcements: but were driven back again by contrary winds. However, on the 23d they sailed to the eastward, passed Jersey, Guernsey, and saw the Isle of Wight, and on the 26th steered with a north wind for the French coast, and run in with the land near Havre de Grace. But, after lying in sight of that port all the 27th and 28th; ordering the flat-bottomed boats for landing the forces to be hoisted out; reconnoitring the coast, which the Duke of Marlborough and Mr. Howe undertook personally in a cutter; and four days provisions got ready for the men to take with them on shore, nothing was executed to annoy the enemy. On the 29th the whole fleet bore away before the wind for Cherbourg, and came to an anchor at about two miles from the town; six batteries fired on the transports to no purpose, and a considerable number of people, some of whom appeared to be regular forces, were

Stopt with bad weather.

Sail to the eastward.

towards Cher-
bourg.

A. D. 1758. were drawn up along the strand, nevertheless it was resolved to attack the forts Quérqueville, l'Honnnet and Gallet, in the night; which was prevented by a violent wind, that hindered the troops from landing, and rendered it impossible to sustain them in case of a repulse, if the disembarkation could have been effected. Then it was resolved to stand in with the whole fleet, to cover a general landing. But that resolution was also abortive. The storm increased; the transports ran foul of one another: and, as the gale blew directly upon the coast, all the shipping was exposed to the perils of a lee-shore. Besides there began to be a scarcity of provisions, and the hay for the horses was almost eat up. So that this great and expensive expedition-fleet returned, next morning, for the coast of England, and on the 1st of July arrived at St. Helen's.

While

* Extract of a letter from an officer belonging to the light-barge, on board a transport at St. Helen's, July 3.

" We are arrived here after having made one of the grandest bouées, at and near St. Maloes, that ever was seen in France; all which was executed in nine hours, without the least molestation from the enemy, as if they themselves would receive some pleasure from so striking a flame being struck up among them; or rather, the water-pipes leading to St. Maloes being cut off, and a threaten of immediately setting fire to the town, if they made any resistance, rendered them thus inactive, being in the greatest panic and confusion. By some officers belonging to the army of France we are informed, that the damage done by our troops to the docks, King's stores, and shipping, exclusive of private property, would require much more than 12,000,000 of livres to replace, exclusive of the expence of building,

While the British arms were carrying terror along the Gallic shore, the fate of our enemies and the relief of our allies were determined by the British parliament. The Commons granted 60,000 men for the sea service, including 14,845 marines: 53,777 effective men, including officers and 4000 invalids for guards and garrisons in Great Britain, Proceedings in parliament.

Guernsey, Jersey, &c. and exclusive of the garrisons and forces in the plantations and Gibraltar:

four regiments of foot on the Irish establishment, serving in North America and the East Indies: a supply to subsist and keep together the army formed last year in his Majesty's electoral dominions: Grants for the German war.

and for payment of 12,000 and upwards of Hessian troops: 670,000 l. for the support of the King of Prussia: 463,084 l. 6s. 10d. for maintaining 38,000 hired troops in Germany; and 386,915 l. 13s. 2d.

for the forage, bread, artillery, &c. 100,090 l. for paying and clothing the militia: 800,000 l.

for defraying the extra expences of the war: 20,000 l. for the payment of the troops in East India: 10,000 l. for the support of the British forts on the coast of Africa. Which grants, with the other provisions made by parliament for the current year, amounted to 10,486,457 l. And in building, and the time they will take up in being brought to their former condition of strength, &c. The private property destroyed is valued at much more than the public, which could not be avoided, the merchant ships having thrown themselves close in with the decks and men of war, and under the cannon of the forts."

Of which the sum of 1,861,897 l. was granted for the aid of our friends on the continent.

A. D. 1758. consequence thereof we find that the state of our national strength or forces by sea and land in British pay, including artificers in the King's docks and yards, was as follows :

Military and naval force of Great Britain.

Establishment for Great Britain, the train of artillery inclusive - - - -	55,000
For Ireland - - - - -	12,000
For N. America, of Regulars 32,000	} 62,000
Provincials 30,000
For the West Indies - - - - -	2,000
For Gibraltar and the East Indies - -	5,000
Allied army in the pay of Great Britain	52,000
Total of land forces	188,000

Naval department, seamen	62,000	} 96,000
Marines - - - - -	14,000
Artificers to the docks, about	20,000

Total 284,000

Ships in commission 310, of which 110 were of the line.

They also endeavoured to remove the objections made by the public to the militia act, and to enforce that act for the present benefit of the nation,

Militia as improved and ren-der'd more effective.

A bill was brought in, and passed, to amend and explain the militia bill; by which every city or town has the liberty to offer volunteers, if they choose it, instead of standing the chance of the ballot: and it is further enacted, That

Every

Every substitute is, equally with the person serving for himself, exempted from being pressed; and the substitute is also entitled (having been called out into actual service) to set up any trade in any place whatever.

A. D.
1758.

Every militia man is to have his clothes at the end of three years.

Every militia man, when the militia of his county shall be ordered into actual service, shall receive one guinea.

The families of the militia men shall, in their absence, be provided for out of the common stock.

If a militia man shall fall sick on a day of march, he is to be provided for.

The militia can never be sent out of the Kingdom upon any pretence whatever; nor can they, as appears by the oath they take, be employed, but only for the immediate defence of their country.

The captains have power of making corporals out of the private militia men, which is sixpence advance each day of exercise; and the further vacancies of sergeants are to be filled up out of the militia men, which is one shilling a day the whole year. Militia men's sons may also be appointed drummers, which is sixpence a day the whole year.

Another act passed for the encouragement of seamen's act for bet-seamen employed in the royal navy: to establish ter pay-a regular method for the punctual, frequent and ment of certain payment of their wages, to enable them wages.

A. D. 1758. more readily and easily to remit the same, for the support of their wives and families, and to prevent frauds and abuses attending such payments. Of which you'll find an abstract in the margin.

1. Every volunteer, entering his name, shall receive a certificate thereof gratis, and be entitled to wages, from the day of the date thereof, inclusive, upon his appearance on board within fourteen days, if the place where he enters is not above 100 miles from the ship; 20, if above 100 miles; or 30, if above 200 miles; and shall have the usual conduct money, with two months wages advance, before the ship proceeds to sea.

2. Every supernumerary man, serving ten days in a ship, shall be intitled to his wages and all other benefits, as if he was a part of the complement; but men, lent to other ships, shall remain intitled to their wages on the books of the ship from which they were lent, until they be regularly discharged, and in no other.

3. Every inferior officer or seaman, turned over to another ship, that is then in, or shall come into, a British port, where there is a commissioner of the navy, shall be paid all the wages due to him in the former ship, before the other proceeds to sea, unless the admiralty order it otherwise, in cases of the greatest exigency only; and, in this case, he shall receive his wages as soon as the ship shall again come into a British port, where there is a commissioner of the navy.

4. No officer or seaman, turned over, shall be rated in a lower degree than he was before; and he shall have an advance of two months wages, before the present ship sails, if not already received.

5. As soon as any ship, which has been in sea-pay twelve months or more, shall arrive in any British port, all the wages due, except the last six months, shall be immediately paid; and the whole shall be paid within two months, at farthest, after the arrival of such ship in port to be laid up.

6. The month shall consist of twenty-eight days.

7. The

The business of this session of parliament being complete, and the season for retiring into the country

A. D.
1758.

7. The captain, or commander, shall make out a ticket, upon the death of every inferior officer or seaman, and transmit it, by the first safe opportunity, to the commissioners of the navy; and payment shall be made, within a month after the receipt thereof, without fee or reward, to the executors or administrators of such officers or seamen, or their attorney.

8. The captain, or commander, shall make out a ticket for every inferior officer or seaman discharged as unserviceable, and send it in the manner mentioned in the preceding article; he shall also give such officer or seaman a certificate of his discharge, containing an exact copy of his ticket, and a description of his person; and, upon the commissioners being satisfied, that the ticket was made out for such person, they shall testify the same on such certificate, and immediately deliver him the ticket assigned for payment, which shall be made, at the navy office, without fee or reward, to him, and to no other person. If the ticket shall not have been sent to, or received by the commissioners of the navy, the copy of the ticket in the certificate shall intitle him to the money therein appearing to be due; and, if such officer or seaman produce his certificate to a commissioner of the navy residing in any British port, he being satisfied about it, shall sign and transmit the same to the commissioners of the navy; who, within four days after the receipt thereof, are to send a ticket, or, if such ticket had not been sent to, or received by them, the said certificate, to the commissioner at such port, who shall, thereon, cause immediate payment to be made, without fee or reward; he shall also send such officer or seamen to the nearest hospital, to be received and victualled, from the time of his presenting such certificate until payment is made. If any such certificate be lost or destroyed, or not presented by the person himself, or the money due on it shall not be paid before the general payment of the ship's company, the ticket shall be cancelled, and the wages payable, as if no ticket or certificate had been made out.

A. D. 1758. country far advanced, his Majesty, not being able to go in person to the House, appointed Lords Commissioners

9. When a captain, or commander, shall send any inferior officer or seamen into any hospital or sick quarters, he shall transmit with him a ticket for his wages then due; and, if he be regularly discharged from thence, as unserviceable, he shall have a certificate of his discharge, with the sick ticket annexed thereto; and, if he presents the same to a commissioner at any British port, such commissioner, after he has signed the certificate, shall forthwith send it to the commissioners of the navy, who, without delay, shall transmit a proper ticket, or pay-list, to the said commissioners, who shall cause immediate payment to be made to such officer or seaman, without fee or reward; who shall be maintained in such hospital, or sick-quarters, from the time of his presenting the certificate and sick ticket until he receive what is due to him.

10. The payment of tickets, &c. shall not be delayed, though the muster or pay-books be not regularly sent to and received by the commissioners of the navy; but, if any error be made in a ticket, &c. the loss shall be made good out of the wages of the captain or commissioner by whom they were made out.

11. As often as a ship, which is not in a port of Great Britain, or on the coast thereof, shall have twelve months wages due, the captain, or commander, shall cause the names of all the inferior officers and seamen to be called over, and shall do the same at the end of every six months; and, if any of them shall then declare, or deliver in writing, the name and place of abode of his wife, father, or mother, and desire, that the whole or any part of his wages, then due, except for the last six months, should be paid to such wife, father, or mother, the captain, or commander, is strictly required to cause four lists to be made out of the persons desiring to make such remittances, which he shall, without delay, transmit to the commissioners of the navy; who, on the receipt thereof, shall immediately make out two bills for the payment of the Commissioners to deliver his sense of their conduct in parliament, who on the 20th of June, in the King's name, made the following speech : A. D. 1758.

“ My

wages so allotted by each person, one of which shall be sent to the persons specified in the lists, and the other to the receiver, collector, or clerk of the Cheque; and if the person to whom any such bill is sent shall, within six months from the date thereof, deliver the same to such receiver, &c. with a certificate that the person is the wife, father, or mother, of such officer or seaman, signed by the minister and churchwardens, or, in Scotland, by the minister and two elders of the parish where such person was married or resides, such receiver, &c. being satisfied about the certificate, shall, without fee or reward, immediately pay the sum mentioned in the bill; and such bill with a duplicate thereof, being produced at the navy-office, shall forthwith be assigned for payment by the commissioners: but, if payment of the said bill be not demanded, and a duplicate thereof, &c. be not delivered, within six months from the date thereof, it is to be cancelled, and the sum contained therein becomes payable to such inferior officer or seaman, when the ship shall be paid.

12. The proceedings are the same, if, when wages shall be paid at the pay office, or any of the out-ports, any inferior officer or seaman desires to remit the whole, or part of his wages to his wife, children, parents, or any other person.

13. The wages, pay, and allowances earned by any indentured apprentice shall, as hath been usual, be paid to his master, unless he was above eighteen years of age when his indentures were executed, or shall be rated as a servant to any officer, to whom such apprenticeship is unknown.

14. Captains, or commanders, shall send, from time to time, to the commissioners of the navy, complete pay-books, lists, and tickets, and also, once in two months, complete muster books, under the penalty of forfeiting all their wages to the chest of Chatham, and of being liable to be further

A. D.
1758.

“ My Lords, and Gentlemen,

His Majesty's speech, by commission.

WE have received the King's commands, upon this occasion, to assure you, that his Majesty has the deepest sense of the loyalty and good affections punished by a court-martial, except in cases of necessity, to be made appear to the satisfaction of the Lord High Admiral, or commissioners of the admiralty.

15. The tickets, &c. shall be sufficient vouchers for payment thereon.

16. Captains, or commanders, issuing other tickets than the act directs, shall pay 50l. for every ticket, and also forfeit all their wages to the chest at Chatham.

17. No letters of attorney, for wages, or allowances of money, shall be valid, unless therein declared to be revocable, and the same, if made by an inferior officer or seaman then in the service, be signed before, and attested by the commander, and one of the other signing officers, or by a clerk of the Cheque; and, if made by a person after his discharge from the service, unless the same be signed before, and attested by the mayor or chief magistrate of the place where he then resides; or unless the letter, if made by an executor or administrator, be signed before, and attested by the minister and churchwardens, or, in Scotland, by the minister and two elders of the parish where he resides.

18. No more than 1s. shall be taken for the probate of any will, or letters of administration, granted to the widows, children, &c. of inferior officers, seamen, or marines dying in the service, unless the goods and chattels are of the value of 20l. nor more than 2s. unless they are of the value of 40l. nor more than 3s. unless they are of the value of 60l. under the penalty of 50l. to be paid by the offender to the party aggrieved. The case is the same, as to the issuing out commissions to swear such widows, &c.

19. Whoever, affections demonstrated by his parliament, throughout the whole course of this session. The zeal

A. D.
1758.

19. Whosoever, willingly or knowingly, shall personate, or falsely assume the name or character of any person intitled to wages, &c. for service done in any ship of the royal navy, or the executor, &c. of such person, or shall procure any other so to do; or shall forge, or procure to be forged, any letter of attorney, or other power; or take a false oath, or procure it to be taken, to obtain the probate of a will, or letters of administration, in order to receive any wages, &c. shall be guilty of felony, and suffer Death.

20. When the pay-books are closed, tickets shall be made out at the navy-office to such seamen as have not received their wages, &c. which shall be paid in course, once a month.

21. British governors, ministers, or consuls, residing in foreign parts, or, where there are no such persons, any two British merchants, are required to provide for seafaring men and boys, subjects of Great-Britain, who, by shipwreck, capture, or other unavoidable accident, shall be in those parts, or shall be discharged there as unserviceable, from the royal navy, at 6d. per diem each, and to send them home with all convenient expedition.

22. Masters of ships shall have 6d. per diem for each man and boy above their complement.

23. Seamen shall not be taken out of the service for any debt under 20l.

24. But creditors may proceed to judgment and outlawry, and have an execution thereupon, except against their bodies.

25. Receivers of seamen's wages, taking more than 6d. per pound, shall for every offence forfeit 50l. and if the offender be a clerk, officer, or servant, belonging to the navy, he shall lose his place, and be incapable of holding any one of profit in any such office.

26. Clerks, &c. in offices belonging to the navy, taking fees, not allowed by the act, for doing any thing thereby directed, shall be liable to the same forfeitures.

A. D. 1758. which you have shewn for his Majesty's honour and real interest in all parts, your earnestness to surmount every difficulty, and your ardour to carry on the war with the utmost vigour, in order to a safe and honourable peace, must convince all the world, that the ancient spirit of the British nation is still subsisting in its full force.

His Majesty has also commanded us to acquaint you, that he has taken all such measures, as have appeared to be most conducive to answer your public spirited views and wishes. Through your assistance, and by the blessing of God upon the conduct and bravery of the combined army, his Majesty has been enabled not only to deliver his dominions in Germany from the oppressions and devastations of the French, but to push our advantages on this side of the Rhine.

His Majesty has cemented the union between him and his good brother the King of Prussia by new engagements, with which you have been already fully acquainted.

Our fleets and armies are now actually employed in such expeditions as appeared likely to annoy the enemy in the most sensible manner; to promote the welfare and prosperity of these kingdoms; and particularly to preserve our rights and possessions in America; and to make France feel our just weight and real strength in those parts. His Majesty trusts in the Divine Providence, that they may be blessed with such success as will most effectually tend to these great and desirable ends,

Gentlemen

Gentlemen of the House of Commons,

A. D.
1755.

We are particularly commanded by the King, to return you his thanks for those ample supplies, which you have so freely and unanimously given. His Majesty grieves for the burdens of his people; but your readiness in supporting the war is the most probable means the sooner to deliver you from it. You may be assured, that nothing will be wanting, on his Majesty's part, to secure the most frugal management,

My Lords, and Gentlemen,

His Majesty has directed us to repeat his commendation to you, to promote harmony and good agreement amongst his faithful subjects; and to make the uprightness and purity of his intentions and measures rightly understood. Exert yourselves in maintaining the peace and good order of the country, by enforcing obedience to the laws and lawful authority: and by making the people sensible, how much they hurt their own true interest by the contrary practice.

For their sakes, the King has commanded us to press this upon you; for their true interest and happiness are His Majesty's great and constant object."

His Majesty in a more particular manner takes notice of the ample supplies, which had been so freely and unanimously given for the support of the war. On which it will be proper to remark, That though these supplies were very extraordinary, thereon.

Remarks

A.D.
1758.

nary, and the war was carried on at an immense expence, they were necessary. There was no other way to defeat the designs of our enemies. France was engaged by her confederacy to pay extraordinary subsidies to Austria, Russia, Sweden, and other German allies, in order to carry her point. Therefore the case was nothing more than opposing one great expence to another; whose balance must always turn in favour of the nation that shall be best able to raise money by trade, and stop the resources from whence the enemy is used to draw his riches and treasure. This was the real case between France and England. France was loaded with a vast expence in armies and subsidies, and deprived of her trade, from whence riches came into her treasury. England was daily improving, and acquiring more trade; by which her finances were enabled to carry on the war, at a greater expence than France, and till France should become a bankrupt; which was the view of Mr. PITT, when he entered into the alliance above-mentioned, with Prussia: because that was the only way to oblige France to exhaust her troops and treasures; while the British navy cut off all, or most of her resources from America, and entirely ruined her trade; and at the same time; to increase the riches and revenues of his own country by new and valuable acquisitions, the better to enable her to support this additional expence.

Factions
in the French
cabinet.

The factions and distractions, which at that juncture divided and weakened the French councils, under the influence of a female favourite, were were also improved by our vigilant, disembarrassed and able minister. He was convinced by the cabals at the French court, for the command of the armies in Germany, that their ministry were unable to bestow a proper attention to both elements: there was no strife about the commands at sea: therefore our minister aimed at confounding them more by reiterated blows on all sides: to ruin their navy, while he drew off their attention from the ocean to the plains of Germany. Without which kind of diversion, France would soon have been in a condition to repair the damages of their marine; as in former times.

A. D.
1758.

Reasons
for attacking the French in Germany.

The people with pleasure acquiesced in these sentiments and measures, because they were convinced of their salutary effects. They were also spirited up by the daily advices of the success of Prince Ferdinand, who by this time had driven the French over the Rhine: while, on the other part, the French ministry were trying to accomplish that by intrigue and misrepresentation, which they were not in a capacity to bring about merely by their own strength.

Approved of by the English
nation.

The provocation given by Mr. Richelieu's breach of the convention, for the Hanoverians resuming their arms, furnished the French court with a plausible invective against his Britannic Majesty, Elector of Hanover. In which, under the name of a manifesto, they pretend that their armies entered Germany to maintain the peace of the manifesto

French
against the Hanoverians resuming
arms.

Published by authority at Paris, and dated at Versailles on the 30th of December 1757.

Empire,

A. D. 1758. Empire, in quality of guarantees of the treaty of Westphalia; and that was sufficient to warrant their invasion and seizure of Hanover and Hesse Cassel. Then they proceed, and insist, That the alliance between Austria and France was not unnatural and dangerous to the Germanic liberty; but, on the contrary, that it was quite natural, and necessary to defend that liberty from the dangers arising from the league between England and Prussia. That their King had originally formed a design to confine himself to his own defence against the English in North America, and thereby, if possible, to preserve the advantages of peace to Europe in general, and to the Empire in particular: and that if it happened otherwise, it might be imputed to the ambition and injustice of his enemies.

They inveigh with great acrimony against the Kings of Great Britain and Prussia for presuming to keep foreign troops out of Germany, when they themselves are bringing ruin upon the Germanic constitutions: and accuse them of stirring up and carrying on an unjust war, set on foot in contempt of the faith of treaties, and of the laws of the Empire; and make his Britannic Majesty the first promoter of it.

They further set forth, That the ill success of the unjust and violent enterprizes of the King of England against France, both in America and Europe, having changed the brilliant expectations, with which that Prince's ministers had flattered the British nation into real losses for the present, and

and apprehensions for the future, they have been A. D.
1758. forced to have recourse to fresh expedients for allaying the resentment of that nation, and especially for getting from it such an augmentation of subsidies, of which the Elector of Hanover should come in for a part, and that the way, which seemed to them the fittest for settling their affairs, has been to throw those of others into confusion, and at any rate to kindle a war in Germany.

The King of England and his ministers have done so much justice to the King, as to conclude, that in case of any attack made on the principal states of the Empire, to which he was united, or of any violation of the Germanic laws and constitutions, his Majesty's fidelity towards his allies, his quality of guarantee of the treaty of Westphalia, his constant zeal for the quiet and safety of Germany, would induce him to take part in this war, and that by this diversion they should weaken the efforts, which France was obliged to make by sea, for defending itself against the English.

The court of Hanover has not forgot its advantages in the plan, which it has formed for itself. As the interests of the British nation have for a long time been subordinate to the Elector's convenience, it had two views relative to the latter; the first of procuring to his Electoral Highness large subsidies, by arming the Hanoverians for supporting the King of Prussia's enterprizes, and thus weaken the King's operations for the defence of the liberty of the Empire, and that of the states of the allies.

A. D.
1758.

The second view has been to convert the war of Germany into a religious war, in order to gain to themselves the support of the protestant Princes. Hence a double advantage was to result: if these Princes by their succours facilitated the execution of the designs of their Britannic and Prussian Majesties, an increase of authority and power was thus procured to the Elector of Hanover; to the detriment of his neighbours, both catholic and protestants; and this is known to have long been the favourite object of his ambition: if, on the other hand, the successor should fail, a great part of the damages to be sustained was to be thrown on the allied Princes.

When the war, which had been meditated by the King of England, Elector of Hanover, in concert with the King of Prussia, had broke out in Germany; the ideas which these two Princes had formed from the King's fidelity to his engagements, were not mistaken; the states of the Empire attacked by the King of Prussia, together with the Princes, who had most at heart the Germanic system, applied for assistance to his Majesty, both as an ally of the Empire and guarantee of the treaty of Westphalia, as in virtue of his alliances merely defensive with several courts of Germany; and though the King was engaged in a personal and onerous war with England, he did not hesitate to form the generous resolution of employing the greatest part of his forces in the defence of his allies, and the maintenance of the laws of the Empire, and of the Germanic system, threatened

threatened with a total subversion from their Britannic and Prussian Majesties, both as Kings and Electors. A. D. 1758.

The King of England was conscious, that every kind of reason authorised his Majesty not to make the chimerical distinction he was for establishing betwixt his quality of King and that of Elector, especially when one raises a war and pays the costs, and the other takes upon him the execution of it.

At length the Hanoverians having provoked his Majesty's troops by hostilities of every kind, the moment came for repelling force by force, and to make them and their allies repent of their outrages, and victory seconded the justice of the King's arms, by the successive advantages which the French troops obtained over them.

They then come to the convention of Closter-Seven, as follows:

But the King's generous sentiments have never shone with greater lustre than in the capitulation of Closter-Seven. The Hanoverian army being forced to fly before that of the Marshal de Richelieu, had been obliged, as its last shift, so to take itself to flight. In a more dangerous condition it could not be. It was the concern of the Duke of Cumberland, General of the Hanoverians, besides fearing the just discontent of his allies, which was near breaking out, to save his troops from the total destruction with which they were threatened, to secure the treasure of the King his father, and to hinder the duchies of Bremen and Verden from becoming the theatre of the war, and to exempt all all the King of England's dominions in Germany from the miseries consecutive to a general defeat, and which by a concurrence of circumstances would have been too justifiable.

A.D.
1758.

It was no favourable conjuncture for softening the victor. The King of England was sending away a very strong Squadron, with land forces, for a descent, with a design of making themselves masters of Rochefort, or at least burn the docks, the storehouses, in a word, to commit all possible hostilities on the coast of France.

Besides many subjects of apprehensions for the defeated party, there was one of greater weight than all the others; past experience seemed to have inspired a grounded mistrust of any proposal from the King of England, Elestor of Hanover; of this the Duke of Cumberland had recent proofs. After he had been obliged to retreat into the dutchy of Bremen, he had proposed a neutrality, and it was refused him; he had acquainted the French ministry, that he was authorised by full powers from the King his father, to treat of a peace, of a neutrality, or of a preliminary accommodation; and the King, faithful to his allies, would hearken to no proposal but in concert with them.

From all these reasons, the Duke of Cumberland did not believe that he should be able, by himself, to obtain the capitulation, which alone could secure him from all the several dangers he had to fear; but being informed of the King's great regard for the King of Denmark, his ally, he

he implored the assistance of that Prince, and got a cessation of arms to be proposed to the Marshal de Richelieu by the negotiation of the Count de Lynar, the King of Denmark's minister, and under his Danish Majesty's guarantee. A. D. 1758.

On this proposal the Marshal deliberated which was best for the Empire, to grant or refuse the capitulation. By the latter he answered the King's just vengeance; in the former he considered the advantages of keeping the Hanoverians and their allies inactive during the remainder of the war, and consequently of reserving his troops for marching without delay to Halberstadt, and by the celerity of his operations to hasten the evacuation of Saxony, and the restoration of the peace in Germany. As the King's sentiments were perfectly known to him, he immediately preferred that measure, which he judged might be most beneficial to the Empire and the allies of France, and he granted the capitulation or military convention, which the Duke of Cumberland offered to him through the Count de Lynar.

The King, such was his zeal for his allies and for the Empire, approved of the Marshal de Richelieu's conduct, and to strengthen the capitulation, proposed the adding of some explications, which should so clearly fix its meaning, as to obviate any misinterpretations. These explications were of the following tenour:

1. That the cessation of hostilities should last during the whole time of the present war.

No. III.

H

2. That

A.D.
1758.

2. That the Hanoverian troops, which were to go on the other side of the Elbe into the dutchy of Lawenburg, should not come out of it, and, together with the troops remaining on this side, should not commit any hostility neither against the King, nor against his allies; and that the French troops likewise should not commit any hostilities against them.

3. That no English troops should be admitted into the dutchies of Bremen and Verden.

4. That the troops, both the Hanoverians and those of the auxiliaries, should not serve during the present war, either against the King, or against his allies, nor join those of the King of England, nor those of his allies.

Had there on the side of the court of Hanover been the same good faith as on the King's side, these explications would have met with no difficulty.

The sense they offer had been contained in the conventions of the 8th and 10th of September, either in equivalent terms, or by a natural inference; and so just were they that the Count de Lynar, to whom they were delivered, judged them to be the true meaning, in which the convention had been understood; and the court of Copenhagen was of the same opinion.

They then endeavoured to show, that these explications were virtually contained in the convention, that though not agreed to, the convention remained in full force, and that the Danish minister was of this opinion. After this they go into a long and tedious account of the behaviour of the Hanoverians, Meffers, and Wolfenbutters, and the methods which the Hanoverian generals took to deceive the French general, by making him believe, that they were resolved to observe punctually the convention, while at the same time they were concerting with the King of Prussia, and preparing to recommence hostilities, as soon as they should find a favourable opportunity, by the French army's being dispersed into winter quarters; and this second part they conclude as follows:

A.D.
1758.

"One reflection shall put a period to this detail. If the Duke of Cumberland asked to capitulate, it was because he found himself in a critical position, and justly feared, that should the Marshal de Richelieu attack him, he would ruin the Hanoverian army irretrievably, and make himself master of the town of Stade, and of the depositum lodged there. Had not his situation been so dangerous in every respect, can it be supposed that a Prince, whose courage all Europe has beheld, would have asked to capitulate at the head of an army of near 40,000 men, under the cannon of the town, and in a post of difficult access and well intrenched? But this Prince, whose capacity gave him to perceive, that no retreat remained for him in case he should be beaten, preferred the glory of saving the King his father's troops, and those of his allies, to the vain honour of fighting the King's army, without any grounded hope of success. The more of his self-love he had by this step sacrificed to the good of mankind, and the interest of the King his father, the more sacred and inviolable did the capitulation, which he had asked and obtained, become to him. It is unquestionable in the rules of honour and war, that a capitulation is never to be asked of an enemy till at an extremity; but when reduced to it, it is not lawful to employ those arms against him, which by promise were to be laid down. Honour would look on such a procedure with indignation; and if private persons detest a treachery of this nature, is it not still more unworthy of sovereigns, who are the protectors of good faith, and who are more concerned than private persons to preserve their glory and reputation?

A. D.
1758.

Accordingly the Duke of Cumberland, by laying down his military employments, was for saving himself the infamy of breaking such sacred engagements; he has proved by that step, that he is incapable of being so far wanting to himself; but in sheltering his own honour, why has he not been afraid of exposing that of the King his father?

If the King of England, Elector of Hanover, on his receiving advice of the capitulation, had disowned the Duke of Cumberland his general and son, still would the King have had cause of complaint, military conventions not requiring a ratification; but, at least, there would have been in this proceeding an appearance of good faith. But to temporize during near three months, in seeking occasion for breaking the capitulation with impunity.

A.D.
1758

nity, let the French army march away for Halberstadt, wait till it was separated in the bad season, lay hold of the circumstances of a check to come out of the prescribed limits, under pretence of extending quarters, afterwards taking advantageous posts, equally contrary to the convention; make every disposition for the siege of Harbours, without any previous declaration of war, and when all these preparations are made, and the enemy is thought to be sufficiently weakened and deceived, to be fought with advantage, to declare to him, that hostilities are to be renewed, and that the capitulation is looked on as broken, at the very same moment that the troops are marching to him, and his posts are attacked; to engage one Prince, by seducement, to violate this capitulation; and to hinder another by open force from executing it; to imprison the general of the latter, and detain his troops, and take away his son from him; to make him serve as an instrument to the treachery; this is trampling on the law of nations, on the laws of justice, honour, and good faith; the rights of the sovereignty of the States of the Empire; the ties of nature and of blood; it is to fear neither the judgment of contemporaries, or of posterity; it is wilfully branding one's life and memory with an indelible mark of infamy; in a word, it is daring to set up and give a sanction to the pernicious maxim, "That every means is lawful to obtain one's end."

Principles and procedures so heinous are to be attributed only to the artifices and evil councils of

* This alludes to the Duke of Brunswick. See p. 125. vol. III.

A.D.
1738.

corrupt ministers. To suspect Princes themselves of such principles, would be wanting to the respect due to them.

After the preceding faithful representation of the King's conduct, and that of the King of England, Elector of Hanover, all Europe, and especially Germany, may easily judge of the difference of the intentions of these two Princes, and it is hoped, that they will impute the blame of the consequences of this war to those only, who, in contempt of all laws and all rules, have again taken up arms to hinder the conclusion of it.

This is the cause of all sovereigns, but especially that of the Empire; it being the bad faith of the Hanoverians, which has retarded the success of the King's operations for restoring the peace of Germany; and their unjust and violent proceedings, both towards the King, and the Duke of Brunswick, are a fresh breach of the public peace, and of the treaties of Westphalia.

The King will omit nothing to acquit himself of what he owes to his dignity, injured by the outrage done him by the court of Hanover. As to the Germanic body, his Majesty will redouble his efforts for preserving it from the new dangers with which it is threatened; and fulfil the engagements he has entered into both with his allies and the Empire. He is persuaded that the Electors, Princes, and States, will do justice to the uprightness and generosity of his sentiments; and he with the greater confidence hopes they will second his measures and operations; as agreeably to the wish and resolution of the diet, they tend only to succour the allies of France, to maintain the Germanic system, and to restore order and peace in Germany."

A. D.
1758.

This manifesto, to blind the eyes of the neutral its motives potentates, and to put the best gloss upon their cause, by a new commissorial decree to the diet of the Empire, for assistance against the King of Prussia, was soon followed by a resolution in the French

"His Imperial Majesty, after having capitulated therein the efforts he has jointly made with France, to defend the liberty of the Empire, to deliver the Saxon territories from the yoke they groan under, and restore tranquillity to Germany, takes notice of the constant opposition his Prussian Majesty has persisted in, by paying as little respect to the citation to appear and answer to the ban of the Empire issued against him, as Elector of Brandenburg, as to the resolutions, which his Imperial Majesty and the Empire took, in consequence of the measures he pursued, till the battle of the 5th of November, near Rofsach: upon which the Emperor observes, that though the attempt made on that occasion did not answer the end for which the army of the Empire, and that of France, marched towards Saxony; yet the loss they sustained did not hinder them from keeping at hand to protect the flank of the Empire, that might have been exposed to new vexations. The decree concludes with these terms:

"We perceive but too plainly the design formed by the King of Prussia, Elector of Brandenburg, to carry his rebellion to the highest pitch. Consequently, it is necessary to oppose him by all possible means, and for this purpose to make use of all the forces that can be employed therein. His Imperial Majesty, by his rescript of the 3rd of May last, has already appointed the circles of the Upper Rhine and Swabia, of the project, which the King of Prussia, Elector of Brandenburg, seemed to have formed for making irruptions into all

A. D.
1758.Count de Clermont
superfeded
the M.
Duke de Richelieu.Landgrave
of Hesse Cassel's treaty with France.

French council to recall the Duke of Richelieu. He was superfeded by the Count de Clermont, occasioned by the disgust of the whole army in Lower Saxony, with their marshal and commander in chief, for his misbehaviour towards his officers, and neglect of the soldiers; who were reduced to a most despicable condition, for want of necessaries, by his rapacioulness.

During the winter cessation of arms we met with a most forbidding instance of trust to the fidelity and firmness of a German ally, in the Landgrave of Hesse Cassel. A subsidiary ally, retained by a large pension in time of peace, when his friendship could not avail; and whose enmity can never hurt Great Britain, but in such conjunctures, when foreign and domestic quarrels or commotions shall require an auxiliary aid: But expecting, from appearances, that the cause of Hanover was in a losing condition, this mercenary ally, though a principal in the dispute, and connected with Great Britain by the ties of solemn the states of the Empire, one after another, in order to draw from them by oppressive methods, new supplies; to constrain the ruined subjects thereof to enlist in his troops, and by this means to effect the total destruction of the Empire. His Imperial Majesty therefore expects, that the Electors, Princes and States of the Empire in general, and every one of them in particular, will persist in the zeal they have hitherto shewn, and redouble their efforts to give the Prince of Saxe-Hildburghausen the necessary supplies for maintaining the troops, and every thing requisite, in order to oppose in the most vigorous manner an Elector who menaces the whole empire, and prevents his penetrating into the most distant circles, &c."

treaties,

treaties, and of gratitude and honour, sued to be enlisted into the service of our common enemy. He commissioned the minister of the Duke de Dourponte, to present and negotiate a plan at Versailles, in his name, by which the Landgrave of Hesse-Cassel proposed to enter into no engagement against the King of France and his allies; to give no assistance directly or indirectly to the enemies of his Majesty and his allies; never to give his vote in the general or particular assemblies of the Empire, against his Majesty's interest; but to employ his ~~interest~~ jointly with France, to quiet the troubles of the Empire, and to engage his troops, then in the Hanoverian army, to serve France on condition that they should not act in the present war against his Britannic Majesty: that his dominions should be immediately restored in the condition they were in, when subdued by the French forces; exempt from all future contributions of all kinds; guaranteed, and effectually defended against any attack made upon them in resentment of this convention; and excusing from furnishing his contingent in the army of the Empire, and from paying the Roman months.

The same state-trick was played by the Duke of Brunswick, whose consanguinity with his Britannic Majesty might have possessed him with better sentiments. The Duke submitted to the following terms of neutrality. That the cities of Brunswick and Wolfenbuttle should receive a French garrison, during the war, which might use at their pleasure

At Da.
1758.

Treaty of the Duke of Brunswick with France.

A.D.
1757.

save the artillery, arms, and military stores found in them: That the Duke's forces should be recalled from the Hanoverian army, disbanded, disarmed, and sworn not to serve against the King or his allies during the war. That he should be allowed a body-guard of one battalion of foot, and two squadrons of horse; subject to the regulations made by the M. Duke de Richelieu and the intendant of his army: that the Duke should pay the Roman months, and supply his contingent to the Imperial army: and that he should vote in the diet at Ratisbon, conformable to the resolutions approved and confirmed by the Emperors: On condition of his being restored to the favour of the French King, that neither his revenues nor treasure should be touched, nor his administration of justice invaded, and that nothing further should be demanded of him, but winter-quarters for the corps destined to pass the winter in the dukedom of Brunswick.

This convention with France and Austria was signed at Vienna, by his minister, so early as on the 20th day of September 1757, but neither the Landgrave, nor this Duke had it in their power to perform their parts of those covenants. The dispatch, with which the Brunswick treaty was negotiated at Vienna, hurried its ratification. But the delay which the Flemish treaty met with, in the confused court of Versailles, protracted the signing thereof till a reverse of their fortune inspired the Landgrave with sentiments more to his advantage, which, at all times, seems to have been his ruling maxim. A. D. 1758.

As for the Duke of Brunswick, it appears, from his expostulatory letter to Prince Ferdinand, his brother, invested with the command of the Hanoverian army, and resuming the operations of war, after the convention of Closter-Seven, against the French, that he was resolved to avail himself of a neutrality, on the conditions above-recited. In which the Duke complained that the Prince had seduced his troops, decoyed his son and disgraced his family; threatening to use force for enforcing a compliance to his commands, if his son did not, according to his command, quit the army and make the tour of Holland; and if his troops were not sent home to be disarmed and disbanded. However, Prince Ferdinand remained firm in his resolution. He kept both the troops and the Duke's son, with their own consent; and their bravery and success, in a little time, inspired the father with better sentiments, in regard to his connections with his new allies; reconciled him to his son, and made him to approve of measures quite contrary to the treaty he had made with the enemies of his Britannic Majesty, Elector of Hanover.

His complaint against Prince Ferdinand.

Nevertheless, by this defection of the Hessians and Brunswickers, the French gained some considerable advantages. It accounts for the civilities and progress their arms met with in the Landgravate of Hesse; which country, had it been under the dominion of a fast, uncorrupt, steady friend

Remarks thereon.

A. D. 1752. friend to England, might have given the French, such a check, as to have prevented many disasters both to that Landgravate and to their neighbouring states. And it put the Duke de Richelieu in quiet possession of Brunswick without a stroke, or loss of time.

Operations
of the Ha-moverians.

Under all these disadvantages, Prince Ferdinand, by detached parties, kept the French army, even to the gates of Brunswick, in continual alarm, and cleared the whole territory of Bremen. This progress of the Hanoverian army threatening an entire repulse of the parties posted by the French in that part of the country, the Duke de Broglie was detached with a considerable body of troops, drawn out of Ottersbourg, Rothenburg, &c. and advanced toward Bremen. He threatened the inhabitants with the utmost vigour of military execution, in case they dared to make any opposition. The deputies sent by the magistrates to know his will, and desiring time to deliberate, could obtain no other answer, than "not a moment can be allowed;—the Duke de Richelieu's orders are peremptory, and admit of no delay." However the magistrates were not intimidated. But when the inhabitants saw the heavy cannon brought up within musket-shot of their city, scaling-ladders fixed to their walls, and the gates ready to be forced open, they, by earnest importunity, prevailed with them to comply with the demand of the French general. But not till he had promised, upon his honour, that no violence should be offered, nor alteration should be made to the prejudice

Bremen
forced to surrender
to the French.

dice of their rights, privileges and government, nor to the liberty, religion and commerce of the inhabitants. How honourably Broglie would have kept his word is uncertain. For, on the 1st of February, Prince Ferdinand being joined by a body of Prussian horse, under the command of Prince George of Holstein Göttrorp, marched with the main body of his army, to drive the French from thence. In his way he dislodged them from Rattenburg, garrisoned by 150 men, who were made prisoners of war, after six hours resistance: and from Otterbourg, which the Prince found deserted; but they had left all their artillery and ammunition. Verden was also evacuated on advice of his approach. His Highness then directed his march to Bremen, of which he took quiet possession, the French having quitted that city on the 24th of February.

A. D.
1758.

The French fly before Prince Ferdinand's army.

Here Prince Ferdinand received advice that the Marshal Duke de Richelieu was superseded in his command by the Count de Clermont, and that the new commander only waited the return of a courier to determine the ulterior operations of the French army in Lower Saxony, which was reduced to such a weak state by the accidents of war, the want of necessaries, the severity of the season, and by sickness, that it was not in a condition either to take the field, or to maintain their conquests. Count de Clermont found his countrymen in such a deplorable condition, that he wrote to his sovereign, "He found his Majesty's army divided into three bodies, one above " ground,

Their miserable condition,

A. D. 1758. "ground, who were become a parcel of thieves
 "and vagabonds, and all in rage, and other un"der ground, and the third in the hospitals." Therefore he desired his Majesty's instructions, whether he should endeavour to bring the first away, or whether he should stay till it had joined the other two.

Difficulties to be surmounted by Count de
 Clermont.

Be that as it will, it is apparent that Clermont had been hurried away to the army with such haste, for fear of a general mutiny, that he neither carried discretionary orders along with him, nor proper instructions for withdrawing his army from that country. And his bad circumstances were so perfectly known to Prince Ferdinand, that this vigilant and wise general resolved to give him no time to mend his condition, or to recruit his deplorable remnant.

Resolves
 to retire.

Evacuate
 Hanover.

From Bremen his Serene Highness resolved to direct his rout by Hoya, to Hanover and Brunfwick; and to drive the enemy before him out of his Majesty's electoral dominions. And where-ever his advanced parties appeared the enemy retired with such precipitation, that they left all their sick, great part of their artillery, ammunition and baggage: and many of those, that fled,
 were either killed or taken prisoners.

Hoya surrenders.

The only stand, this once formidable army seemed to make against the Hanoverians, was at Hoya, a strong fort upon the Weer. Here the Count de Chabot was posted with a considerable detachment to dispute the passage of that river.
 Prince Ferdinand being informed of this resolution,

Don, in his way to Bremen, gave orders, on the 23d of February, to the hereditary Prince of Brunswick, to repair thither with two battalions of Hanoverians, two of the Brunswick troops, and a considerable number of light troops, chaf-seurs and hussars, and dislodge the enemy from that post.—The hereditary Prince marched accordingly, and after a vigorous defence, and the loss of many men on the part of the enemy, he forced them, with bayonets fixed, to surrender; and made between 14 and 1500 men prisoners of war. But Count de Chabot threw himself, with two battalions, into the castle; by which means he obtained an honourable capitulation, on the 23d in the evening, to retire with his two battalions, leaving behind them their baggage and magazines. The whole loss in killed and wounded did not amount to 100 on the part of the hereditary Prince.

A. D.
1752.

The
Extract of a report from an Hanoverian officer to Prince Ferdinand of Brunswick.

Hoya, Feb. 24.

In pursuance of your orders, the Prince hereditary of Brunswick began to march to Doevern yesterday the 23d, at seven o'clock in the morning; It was eleven when we arrived there, being obliged to wait for the hussars and dragoons. From thence we marched towards Bremen, where, as we were informed, there were some boats of timber: We found but one, and two or three small boats, which might serve to carry about eight men each. We were too far advanced to think of retreating; and besides, the intelligence we had endeavoured to procure about the place, and the dispositions made by the enemy for its security, gave us some prospect of success. We then

A. D.
1758.

The reduction of Hoya cleared the way to Zell, Hanover and Brunswick, on the north side of the Weser. We then detached 30 hussars upon our left to Hassel, and Lieutenant Engel, with ten men for the van. Lieutenant Lochner passed the Weser with 30 more, in order to cover our right. The battalion of Oberg, and the squadron of dragons, were destined to make a feint attack on the left side of the Weser. The three other battalions were to pass the river, and enter the back part of the town. As we had but one boat, the passage of the troops over the river took up much time; and the wind rose so high, that after one half of the first battalion of Brunswick guards had passed, the other half was separated by it. Upon this, it was resolved to leave the rest on the other side, viz. one battalion of Oberg's, the second battalion of the Brunswick guards, the remainder of the first battalion of that regiment, and the Hessian squadron. Between four and five o'clock we marched with the regiment of Hauffs, a part of the first battalion, and a haubitzer. When we were got upon the causeway, about a mile and a half from the town, through some mistake, which might have cost us very dear, our detachment fired upon four of the enemy's dragons that were patrolling. This firing was caught from one to another, and at last became general. This unlucky accident was more than sufficient to discover us, and bring us into the greatest distress. However, a bold countenance upon the occasion became necessary; and we marched on, with the utmost diligence, to the town. We met, at first, with no opposition, and advanced as far as the bridge: there the fire grew exceeding smart, yet we never gave ground, though we were so hard pushed. But, as the whole detachment could not equally be brought up, the Prince hereditary formed the design of turning the enemy, and accordingly marched with that part of his first battalion that crossed the river with him. It was necessary, for that purpose, to go round the town, and so pass through a garden and a house, and so attack the enemy in the rear. This succeeded; and the bayonet fixed was chiefly used on this occasion; so that it may be said, humanity the Weser, and commanded the country as far as Minden on the south side of that river. A great number

A. D.
1758.

nity suffered for the slaughter that then happened. The enemy abandoned the bridge, and the Prince joined the Hanoverians again. The regiment of Brittany, and some parties of dragoons, were upon their march; and as we did not find ourselves absolutely sure of keeping this post, the capitulation hereafter-mentioned was granted. The Lorraine guards are demolished. I cannot yet exactly tell their loss, but it is very great. On our side Major Kropf is mortally wounded. Captain Koppelow has a slight wound in his thigh. There are two men killed, and ten wounded, among the subalterns and private men. The regiment of Hauss had twelve men killed, and sixty wounded. The officers who particularly distinguished themselves, were M. de la Motte, who has acted with great prudence and courage. Lieutenant Engel commanded the attack on the left side of the river, and did alone, by his well-judged conduct, fix the enemy's whole attention, which cannot be sufficiently commended. Captain Bourbon, of Hauss's, behaved extremely well. Mess. Richler, Koppelow the captain, and his brother the lieutenant, as well as ensign Vitshum, have all behaved as men of courage and honour ought to do.

By the capitulation of Hoya, the garrison went out with all the honours of war, and the officers with their baggage. The Count de Chabot gave his parole of honour, to deliver up all the cannon, ammunition, and provisions, belonging to the French king. All the prisoners taken during the action, as well officers as private men, to be treated as such; but the chaplains, surgeons, and officers servants to be released.

List of the French prisoners of war, taken at the attack of Hoya, Feb. 23.

Of the regiment of Brittany, two captains, three lieutenants, three of them wounded; 56 private, 15 of whom wounded. Of Gardes Lorraines, five captains, six lieutenants, four number of French hussars of Poleret'sky's regiment had taken post at Nord Drebber. Against whom the

A.D.
1758.

of them wounded; 305 private, 27 of whom wounded.—Of the royal volunteers, one lieutenant, one private.—Of gens d'armes, one captain.—Of the mestre de camp general, one aide major, and 28 private.—Harcourt's dragoons, two private.—Dampier's horse, one ditto, 19 officers, and eight commissaries.—Sick made prisoners in the hospital at Memsen 250.—In all 670.

An abstract of a letter from a French officer at Bremen.

"I was going to write to you from Bremen, when, on the 24th past in the morning, we were informed that the hereditary Prince of Brunswick had stormed and taken Hoya, which was bravely defended by M. de Chabot, with the regiment of Gardes Lorraines, two companies of grenadiers, some piquets of the regiment of Bretagne, and a detachment of Mestre de Camp dragoons. Finding himself surrounded on all sides, and upon the point of being forced, after a considerable loss of men, he retired into the old castle, where he capitulated, and obtained the liberty to withdraw to the next French post, with all the troops he had with him, except such as were intercepted, and which have been made prisoners of war. This happened on the 23d in the evening, and followed the taking of Verden, which M. de St. Chamans found himself obliged to abandon on the 20th, and to retire towards Bremen, on account of the great floods. It was then, on the 24th in the morning, that we heard at Bremen of the fate of Hoya; and M. de St. Germain, judging that he could not be of any use in this post to Count Clermont, immediately resolved to abandon it, after he had sent orders to all the regiments, as well foot as horse and dragoons, to repair that same evening to Bassum. He left Bremen, and charged me with the care of evacuating it, as soon as the artillery and the baggage of the garrison should have been sent away; which I executed about two o'clock in the afternoon. The hospital and magazines

the Prussian hussars of the advanced guard were detached, and they executed their instructions so effectually.

were left at Bremen for want of carriages and time, having no particular charge of them. I happily rejoined M. de St. Germain in the night at Bassum. We passed the night under arms, because we were not far from Hoya, and uninformed of the designs of the enemy. On the 25th we passed the Hunte, and quartered at Wildhusen, which place we quitted on the 26th at ten in the morning, in order to proceed to Veeht, and, upon intelligence that a colonel of foot, whose force we were ignorant of, had crossed the Hunte, we came and passed the night of the 28th at Forde, and arrived the day before yesterday at this place, where we found the regiment of Champagne, the regiment of colonel general dragons, and two regiments of horse. The remains of the Gardes Lorraines, who are about 200 men (for the broken companies, which capitulated with M. de Chabot at Hoya, were gone with a like number at Nienburg) joined us two days ago by the route by Quakenbrugge, and were sent yesterday to escort our heavy baggage to Munster, because there was not sufficient forage here for their subsistence.

As there is a great want of discipline, and the spirit of marauding is not easily rooted out, we have many stragglers in our march, that either are already, or will be, made prisoners. At Hoya were taken the baggage of the Prince de Beauveau, Comte de Laval, and Duc de Guigney, and likewise those of M. de Lille-Bonne, and of the regiment of Harcourt. M. de Lavalette has also lost some things; and some peasant waggon, laden with the effects of M. de St. Germain, fell into the hands of the Hanoverians at Wildhusen. We have no direct news of the Comte de Clermont; we have only just learnt, by an officer who quitted Hanover on the 25th, that the general was acquainted with the abandoning of Bremen, which he had much approved of. Our corps here [at Quakenbrugge] equally consists of 10 battalions, 12 squadrons of dragons, and as many horse, without including the corps under

A.D. 1758. effectually, that after a great slaughter, they brought off 300 horses, a pair of kettle-drums, ten standards, 130 hussars, two lieutenants, two captains, and their Colonel Poleretsky dangerously wounded.

French
evacuate
Hanover.

While these detachments carried all before them, the terror and panic of the enemy increased at the motion of the main army, which Prince Ferdinand marched in two divisions, one on the right and the other on the left of the Weser. So that nothing was thought of at Zell, Hanover and Brunswick, but how to retreat with the greatest safety, not only from the victorious troops advancing apace to drive them out, but from the enraged peasants and inhabitants, whom they had robbed and ruined, with the most inhuman acts of rapine and oppression. Indeed, there was no alternative. They could not trust to their own strength for defence. They must retire in the best manner they could and quickly. The strength of the Electorate was at their gates. Accordingly Zell was evacuated on the 26th of February by the two generals, the Marquis Armentieres and the Marquis de Rochepine, and the garrison under their command. Hanover city, on the 28th of the same month, by the Prince de Clermont and the Duke de Randan; in whose commendation, for the single and only act of humanity done by his countrymen in the progress of their arms

M. de Chabot. Yesterday we fixed upon a position here, to wait for and fight the enemy, if they arrive, unless we receive orders to the contrary.

hitherto,

hitherto, we read a most severe reflection upon the conduct of the French nation, That they are, by far, the most unpolite and cruel of all Christian nations. This governor of Hanover city did no more than prevent the soldiers plundering the poor

They reserved the payment of the arrears of the heavy contributions, and carried off Baron Munchausen, counsellor of the regency, and Mons. d'Hardenburg, a privy-counsellor, as hostages for the same.

Extract of a letter from a gentleman at Zell to his friend at London, dated March 9.

Since the 14th of August we have been plagued with the French; from that time we have had forty troopers quartered in our house, whom we have been obliged to furnish with beds, fire, candles and greens. They have ruined our house, furniture, gardens, pales, &c. They have taken by force our hay, corn, &c. and left us nothing, so that we were obliged to sell and kill our cows, and sometimes we have been three days together without bread. This misfortune has happened to every body. We have been robbed besides of our pewter, copper, and many other things of value. We are a ruined people in this country, and God knows how we shall or can maintain ourselves and get bread for our families. What we have left amounts to many thousand crowns; nay, we cannot yet justly tell what our losses are. The hospital of St. Ann's, the orphan-house, with the children in it, and the whole Friken Wiese is burnt by the French.

On the 14th of December the French burnt, just behind our house, fourteen vessels from Bremen, laden with victuals, so that we expected every moment to see our houses on fire. The loss of those vessels amounted to more than 550,000 crowns, and nothing was saved out of them; so that the merchants at Bremen have been great sufferers thereby. I am not able to give you a true description of our circumstances: it would melt the heart of a barbarian to behold our condition;

A. D.
1758.

Behaviour
at Zell, Hanover
and Brunfwick.

Retire to Hamelen.

Throw a garrison
into Min-
den.

poor citizens, before they themselves ran away; and ordered the magazines of provisions, which they could not remove, nor sell at a low price, to be distributed to the necessitous poor inhabitants, on whom they had lived several months, at free quarters. Which implies, That the French shewed no bowels of compassion towards the inhabitants of other places in their power; but plundered, burnt and distressed them to the last extremity. Of which the neighbouring cities of Zell and Bremen furnish rigid examples.

The forces which evacuated those cities in Hanover passed the Weser, and retired in pretty good order to Hamelen, where the Prince of Clermont assembled all the troops he could possibly collect, having thrown between 3 and 4000 men into Minden, not with any hopes of preserving that fortress; but only by way of expedient, to for nothing is left us but life, and what is life without subsistence? though I hope God will be our best help; he knows how to find ways and means to support us.

I have been this week in the country, and have found most people there, as I may say, naked; they creep together like sheep, to keep one another warm, and they have nothing left to live upon. Most of them have lost their cattle, horses, waggons, &c. Cocks and hens are a great rarity.

To dwell a little longer on our present situation; I must add, that the French have left here about 380 sick. To their sorrow they sent, last year, 119,000 men from France, and now they have not 46,000 left; the rest died in the hospitals, or fell in battles and skirmishes.

Our ramparts and fortifications here are ruined, and our woods and gardens look to much like wildernesses, that few know their own property.

would melt the heart of a barbarian to behold our condition.

A. D.
1756.

gain time by retarding the rapidity of Prince Ferdinand's progress, who was marching in person to attack that city. Such was the wretched state of the French at this time; as to expose themselves to the loss of such a number of men, merely for the sake of retarding the march of the enemy at their heels for a few days only. For, on the 5th of March the hereditary Prince invested the place; and summoned the town to surrender, without effect. Then General Oberg, who commanded a considerable corps on the north side of the Weser, of which the hereditary Prince commanded the van, approached the town in order to form the siege, while General Sporken advanced with another body towards the town on the south side of the river. But the heavy roads and badness of the weather, by retarding the carriage of the heavy cannon, prevented the opening of the trenches till the 9th of March; from which day the attack was carried on so briskly, that the garrison was forced to capitulate, and to surrender themselves prisoners of war on the 14th of the same month.

Minden
besieged,

Capitu-
lates,

Prince Ferdinand having thus secured his rear, pushed forward with his whole army to Hamelen, where the French had their head-quarters. But, on his arrival at that station, nothing was to be found but a great number of sick and wounded, and such part of their magazines as the French had not time to destroy. From hence he pursued them to Paderborn, where he was informed the Prince de Clermont had fixed his head-quarters on evacuated.

Hamelen

French retire to Pa-derborn.

A. D.
1758.

To the Rhine.

the 18th. But the Hanoverian army having next day penetrated as far as Melle, the French hastened their retreat, and fled as fast as they could to the Rhine, and were joined in their march by the troops that had been distributed in Embden, Cassel, and the Landgravate of Hesse, which the French evacuated on the 21st of March, making no stop till they arrived at Wesel, where the Prince of Clermont established his head-quarters, and fortified it with all the diligence and strength in his power; having sent the remains of his army over the Rhine.

Prince
Ferdinand's requisition of English
troops.

Prince Ferdinand, at his first entrance upon the command of the Hanoverian army, had strongly urged the necessity of a supply of British cavalry, to facilitate his operations. How well inclined the British councils were to grant his request, may be easily collected from the proceedings of the parliament then sitting; as well as from the disposition of the cabinet. But there was no way to send those troops with safety. Holland was tied up by a neutrality, from granting a passage, and the French army was in possession of all the countries along the Elbe and Weser. Embden was looked upon as the best landing-place. But Embden was then in the hands of the French. Yet a small squadron of English ships of war might surprize it, and wrest it out of their possession, and protect that place from future insult; and open a

Reasons
for driving
the French
out of Embden.

The garrison consisted of six squadrons and twelve battalions.

free

free port for British troops transported to Ger- A. D. 1758 many.

With this intention Commodore Holmes was Commodispatched with the Seahorse and Strombulo. With dore these he came to an anchor between Delfziel and Holmes Knock, on the 17th of March, notwithstanding dispatched the precaution taken by the enemy to render the with two navigation of the river hazardous, by not suffer- men of ing the buoys to be laid this year, for the direction war.
of its navigation: without which assistance it was impossible, as they thought, for that port to be recovered. But the enemy's surprise and confusion greatly increased on the 18th, when the Commo- Arrives dore, with his little squadron, cut off all their before communication down the river, by stationing his Embden.
ships between Knock and Embden.

The enemy doubled the number of workmen A shew of
upon the batteries they had begun, and set about defence.
erecting three more towards the sea with the utmost expedition, as the only quarter from whence they now had reason to expect an attack. But the intelligence from the country, and the instructions, which they daily received from the Prince of Clermont, put them upon preparations, at the same time, to evacuate the place upon the first command for them to join the main body of their army, then flying before Prince Ferdinand'. Accordingly,
at

The garrison consisted of 1300 French foot, 1200 horse, 1100 Austrian foot, and two companies of artillery, of 60
each, in all 3720.

It was first intended by the French to keep Embden at all events. To make it a place of arms; and to convey all their

A.D.
1758.

Retire.

Lost two baggage
vessels.

at six in the morning of the 19th, the French troops were under arms, and marched out of the town before night; and the Austrians followed on the 20th, at nine in the morning.

The diligence with which the works of the batteries towards the sea were continued, prevented all suspicion of this kind, and favoured the transportation of their baggage and cannon up the river in small vessels by night, which otherwise might have been obstructed by the English from their ships, who got no scent of their real motions till about noon on the 20th. The commodore, informed of the enemy's flight, and that one of their vessels with baggage and artillery was waiting behind a point of land, at some distance from his ships, to run up the river by the next tide; he, as soon as he could stem the tide, dispatched an armed cutter, and two boats well armed, which came up with her and took her; and they, reinforced with another boat, continued the chase up the river, under the command of Captain Taylor. In this pursuit our men acted with the greatest bravery and diligence. They proceeded amidst the enemy's fire, who lined both sides of the river; which was briskly returned from our boats. They saw three of the enemy's vessels, but could come up with only one their magazines at that season, till this critical moment, that they saw it blocked up, unexpectedly, by an English squadron; which seemed, in all probability, to be only the sign of a more powerful squadron. A convincing proof of the importance of this service has since been given to the world.

of

of them, which Captain Taylor attacked, run her aground, and carried her in sight of their army, and under their fire; besides what he received from the vessel itself. But the officers and men on board the store-vessel left it, to recover the shore: in which attempt some of them were dropt by the fire from our boats. Night coming on too quick, Captain Taylor was obliged to lie off for a while, and the other two vessels, with cannon, got under the cover of their army, before day-light, and escaped.

And
1758

Thus the port of Embden was recovered by two ships only, and they of small force, without the loss of a man on our side; on board the first vessel that was taken, was found the son of Lieutenant-Colonel Scholleens*, of Prince Charles of Lorraine's regiment, one corporal, one pioneer, some baggage, and little implements of war, and some money, for the payment of the troops.— On board the second vessel they took a major, the commissary of war, an adjutant, a guard of private men, and three hostages, whom the enemy had carried off from Embden, for security of certain contributions they had imposed upon that city, and left unpaid.

Embden
recovered.

Loss of the French.

During this whole retreat the French were closely attended by the Prussian hussars and Hanovertian hunters, who killed and made prisoners a considerable number of their men, and seized many of their baggage-waggons, and some of

* He being but a boy, was sent away with his baggage, and returned to his father,

their

A.D.
1758.Vechte
taken.

their artillery. They not only deserted and left great numbers of sick and wounded to the mercy of a provoked enemy; but they left behind them provisions and forage, of which they stood in great want. They forgot, or neglected, till it was too late, to call in the garrison stationed in the small fortress of Vechte, on the north-west of Diepholt, who were obliged to surrender prisoners of war, and to deliver up a complete train of 100 pieces of French cannon and mortars, to a party of 150 men sent from Bremen.

French
closely pursued.

As soon as Prince Ferdinand was rightly informed of the rout and disposition of the enemy, who retreated in three columns, one column consisting of the troops which had occupied Hesse, on the left; another, of the troops that marched from Paderborn, under the immediate command of the Prince of Clermont, which marched in the middle; and the third, of the troops which came from Munster, under the command of M. de Villemurs, on the right; and that the Duke de Broglie was the least advanced of the whole; his serene Highness detached the Prince of Holstein, with a large body of horse and foot, to pursue the enemy, and to use the best of his endeavours to break in upon them. These orders were vigorously executed. The rear-guard of the French was attacked in the neighbourhood of Saest, in the county of Mark: a considerable number were taken prisoners, with ten pieces of cannon 24

Consisting of seven companies, 24
pounders,

pounders, 5 six pounders, and a considerable magazine. The small party, which the French left in the county of Bentheim, fell a prey also to a party of Hanoverian hunters and hussars, who attacked two Austrian regiments near Gelhausen, cut twenty of them to pieces, made many prisoners, and brought off twelve baggage-waggons.

A. D.
1758.

After this long march, and fatiguing service, Prince Ferdinand, duly informed that the French army was not to be pursued at present any further with advantage; having also delivered the Landgravate of Hesse and his Britannic Majesty's German dominions from the French invaders, he thought it the most proper time to halt, and for his army to go into winter-quarters of refreshment in the bishopric of Munster; ready to snatch the first opportunity to drive the Prince de Clermont from Wesel, and to carry his victorious arms beyond the Rhine, as soon as he could obtain his requisition of a body of English cavalry to support the attack. And even in this state of inactivity, if it can be so called, the Hanoverian hussars, posted at Dorstein, made frequent incursions as far as Wesel.

Prince Ferdinand goes into quarters of refreshment.

The French ministry could not look upon this destruction of their main army, and the disgrace of the Gallic arms, fleeing before a handful of Conduct and confusion of the French ministry.

Stragglers were extremely ill treated by the peasants. But the hussars only disarmed and plundered them, desiring them to tell their officers, "That such soldiers as they did not deserve to be made prisoners."

Germans,

A. D.
1758.

German, and before those very men, whom they had a few months before treated with contempt and derision, peened up in a corner, and obliged to disarm themselves, or to seek their own security in an eventual cessation of arms, without great confusion and serious reflection for the glory of their nation and the consequences of a retreat, which might encourage their enemy to cross the Rhine. The people were sadly convinced of the fatal effects of cabals and favouritism in the cabinet of their Sovereign; and it is said that the old Marshal Duke de Bellisle took upon him, in this emergency, to deliver the sentiments of the nation in the presence of this King in council, with a spirit of patriotism that does honour to his name.

The speech
of M.
Bellisle in
council.

"I know, said he, the state of our armies. It gives me great grief, and no less indignation; for besides the real evil of the disorder in itself, the disgrace and infamy which it reflects on our government, and on the whole nation, are still more to be apprehended. The choice of officers ought to be made with great deliberation. I know but too well to what length the want of discipline, pillaging and robbing have been carried on by the officers and common men, after the example set them by their generals. It mortifies me to think I am a Frenchman; my principles are known to be very different from those which are now followed. I had the satisfaction to retain the esteem, the friendship, and the consideration of all the princes, noblemen, and even of all

all the common people in all parts of Germany, where I commanded the King's forces. They lived there in the midst of abundance; every one was pleased; it fills my soul with anguish to find that, at present, the French are held in execration; that every body is dispirited, and that many officers publicly say things that are criminal and highly punishable. The evil is so great that it demands immediate redress. I can easily judge by what passes in my own breast, of what our generals feel from the speeches they must daily hear in Germany, concerning our conduct; which indeed would lose much, to be compared with that of our allies. I must particularly complain of the delays and irregularity of the posts, a service which is very ill provided for. I am likewise displeased with the negligence of our generals in returning answers, which is a manifest breach of their duty. Had I commanded the army, a thousand things which are done, would not have been done; and others, which are neglected, would have been executed. I would have improved my communication; I would have had strong posts on the right, on the left, in the center, lined with troops. I would have had magazines in every place. The quiet and satisfaction of the country should have been equal to their present disaffection, at being harassed and plundered; and we should have been as much beloved, as we are at present abhorred. The consequences are too apparent to need being mentioned. I must hint on these things, because late

AVDA
1758.

AVDA
1758.

M. B. M.
the
of the colonels.

AVDA
1758.

A. D. late redress is better than the continuation of the 1758. evil."

Vigorous resolutions

This plain narrative of facts produced vigorous resolutions. The army on the Rhine was augmented with all imaginable diligence; troops were put in motion every where; from the interior parts of the kingdom, towards the seat of action, and the fortifications on the frontiers were put into the best posture of defence, that time and the state of the nation would allow. And to keep up the spirits of the people, who were more inclined to peace than war, a report was industriously spread, that a reconciliation would be soon effected by the mediation of Spain.

M. Bell-isle's letter
to the colonels.

The M. Duke de Bellise, who at this juncture acted as secretary of state, did not confine his endeavours to reform the army; by his firmness in the cabinet; he wrote a letter to all the colonels of the infantry in the King's name, threatening them with dismissal from, and loss of their regiments, in case they continued any longer to connive at the scandalous practices, which had been introduced amongst them, of the sale of commissions, to the great discouragement of merit, the extinction of that necessary emulation, which animates an officer in time of battle, and to the relaxation of discipline throughout the whole army.

Swedes resume the war unwillingly.

The Swedes were prevailed with to quit the island of Rugen, in which they had been blocked up by 15,000 Prussians, now called upon a distant service, to observe the motions of the Russians in Pomerania. They resumed their operations about

the

the end of April: but with such a general aversion, both at court and in the field itself, that they gave the King of Prussia very little concern for the effects of their arms at present; their activity not depending upon a national quarrel, or the inclination of their King, but only upon the fac-tious counsels of a corrupt senate, penurious to Prussia.

The Russians, who had retreated with so much precipitation back towards their own country,
after the action*, which they had with M. Lehwald, were put under the command of General Fermer;
M. Apraxin being disgraced and dismissed from the command in chief, on account of that retreat,
for which he had no orders from his court, as pretended: for since that time the Czarina had been worked upon by various practices of flattery, interest and intrigue, to sign her accession to the quadruple-alliance with Austria, France, and Sweden, and to augment the number of her troops to act against Prussia; which she now divided into two separate bodies, under Generals Fermer and Brown, with express command to return into Prussia, notwithstanding the rigorous season. General Fermer executed his orders with such activity, that he marched back, and got possession of Konigsberg, the capital of Ducal Prussia, on the 22d of January, without opposition. Fermer, having ravaged the country, retired again, and joined the main body of his army, which had en-

Russians
return into Prussia.

Seime Konigsberg.

* See page 409, &c. Vol. II.

A. D. 1758. camped on the Vistula, not far from Danzig, with a design to seize upon that fine city; as appeared from the demand of the Russian agent there, that the magistrates should admit a Russian garrison. But they peremptorily refused, and stood in their own defence so resolutely, that General Fermer did not think proper to carry matters to extremity: so that he passed the Vistula, and directed his march towards Pomerania, where Count Dohna had assembled an army to oppose him, which occasioned this general once more to retire; and, after plundering all before him, he re-joined his main body, to wait, as it was thought, the final orders of his court.

Army of the Empire
assembles.

The army of the Empire began to re-assemble in March, near Bamberg in Franconia, under the Prince of Deux Ponts, whose proximity attracted the Prussian hero's immediate attention: who detached 30,000 men, under the command of Prince Henry of Prussia, to watch their motions, and to prevent their junction with the French; who were forming a new army for that purpose; and might have completed the ruin of his Prussian Majesty, by that means, had not Prince Ferdinand defeated their intentions, by cutting them out sufficient work to guard their own frontiers on the Rhine, and our naval armaments found employ for their troops in the defence of their own coasts.

The intention of France
and her allies.

For, it is evident from every step that had been taken between France and her allies, during the winter, that they had combined to act in concert, with one fatal blow to crush the King of Prussia,

and

and shall be made an easy prey of the British allies, and to force all the States and potentates on the continent to unite with them in one common league to distress and ruin the British trade and interest, and thereby to destroy her strength and naval power, which can't exist without commerce, and commerce can't be carried on with advantage without an interest to circulate its produce amongst foreign nations. It could avail us nothing had we the manufacturing of all the fleeces in the world, the sale of all the produce of the Indies; the monopoly of the American fisheries; and the exclusive trade with North America and the coast of Africa, had we no vent, no market to put off, and to dispose of our produce, manufacture and imports for money and the comforts and necessities of life. Foreign trade is the support of our riches and strength: therefore every obstruction in that channel must be watched, prevented, or cleared away in due time, with the utmost diligence and vigour.

Our interest on the continent.

The Austrians had assembled a grand army near Koningsgratz in Bohemia, under M. Count Daun, ready to seize the first opportunity to enter Silesia and Saxony; the center, to which all the armies in motion against his Prussian Majesty seemed to tend.

Austrians in motion.

His Prussian Majesty, thus surrounded and threatened with so many powerful armies, was obliged to have recourse to stratagem, as well as to arms. But first he turned the blockade of Schwiedau into a siege. He opened the trenches

King of Prussia's operations

Receives Schwarzen-
berg.

The county of Glatz.

Detaches a party into Bohemia.

Provides for the security of Saxony.

His great abilities.

on the third of April, and in defiance of that good Austrian army, rejected the proposal to surrender prisoner of war in Bohemia. By the first fruits of this year's campaign, the Austrians lost 7000 men, of which number the garrison originally consisted, but 2000 had taken out of their ing the blockade by Salsburg, &c. and the Austrians were totally driven out of Silesia. In the mean time General Foulke detached with a considerable detachment into the county of Glatz,
and obliged the Austrians under General Jahnke to abandon this post in that country: and his Majesty in person marched, with a part of his army, towards Glatz and Friedland, and detached a part of it to Grossröhr in Bohemia;
which dislodged an Austrian garrison, and opened a way into Bohemia, for the Prussian light horse,
who raised contributions, and harassed the en-posts of the enemy, even as far as the main guard of Count Daun's army.

Saxony was put into a posture of defence with 30,000 men under Prince Henry of Prussia.
And Silesia was covered from any surprise and incursions of the Russians, by a considerable body posted between Wola and Glogau; beside the army under Count Dönn, in the eastern parts of Pomerania.

But what shewed the good-willship of his Prussian Majesty, he not only provided their forces
for their particular service, but he possessed them
in such a manner as to preserve a communication with each other, to avoid any distant

for

for several days; and at the same time moved his old designs upon the Austrians.

A. D.
1756

By the success of the Prussian army, Count Daun was induced to believe, that it was the King's intention to open the campaign by marching into Bohemia: so that all their attention was taken up to oppose an army of that kind. But, all on a sudden, the Prussian Majesty gave the Austrians the slip. For with 60,000 men, he had retired near Neis in Silesia, he passed into Moravia, by a rapid march, and at Troppau, which he reached in three days from Neis, he divided this army into two columns, the first under M. Klichy to take the route of Jagerndorf, who set out on the 25th of April: the other under the King in person on the 27th, both directing their march to the plain of Olmutz, which they entered by Steinsberg and Gitsin on the 3d of May.

Daun's
Count
Daun.

Slips past
the Austrian army.

Joins his parties and directs his march to Olmutz.

General Fouquet had orders to remain in the country of Glatz, and watch the motions of Count Daun. But, as soon as he perceived by the enemy's motions, that they also were preparing to march into Moravia, this general went to Neis, and under his convoy the artillery and warlike stores that were requisite for besieging Olmutz. On the 12th he arrived at Gitsin without any opposition from the enemy, and immediately pushed his march to Libmitz, where some Austrian were made prisoners. On the 14th the King advanced towards Olmutz, and drove away a body of the enemy's cavalry posted there; who retired beyond Prossnitz. Near that town the Prince of Wartenberg sent

General
Fouquet's
march.

A.D. his camp, consisting of four regiments of dragoons, 1758. one of hussars, and some battalions of fusiliers.

Siege of Olmütz.

On the 27th of May the trenches were opened before Olmütz, on the side of Tobitschau; and the other side of the river, towards Dolcin, was invested by a regiment of dragoons, two battalions, and 500 hussars. The King drove the Austrian and Saxon cavalry, under General Ville, beyond Wischaw, and his army took possession of all the posts proper for covering the body of troops that were to be employed in the siege. The Margrave Charles occupied the post of Neustadt, the Prince of Anhalt-Deslau that of Littau, and the King took post on the eminences between Prosnitz and Olitschau.

M. Daun
marches to its relief.

On the 10th of June, General Puttkammer, arrived with a convoy from Silesia, without meeting any molestation: but, as this convoy was not sufficient to finish the siege, measures were taken to bring up another. Mean while the vanguard of the enemy arrived in Moravia; General Harsch, who commanded it, pitched his camp on the rising grounds of Aller-Heiligen, opposite to Littau. Marshal Daun arrived with his army at Gewitz, and almost at the same time a body of five or 6,000 of the enemy advanced to Prosnitz; which obliged M. Keith to place Bareuth's dragoons near Wisternitz, and the independent companies at Blstrowan and Holian. The enemy's design was to throw succours into the town: and in the night of the 8th of June, they attacked a battalion of volunteers, whom they forced to retire. Bareuth's regiment, regiment, who had been on horseback the whole night, thought that they might return into the camp without waiting for the coming back of their patrols; but scarce had the dragoons entered their tents, when the enemy forced their main guard, penetrated into the camp, and sent the reinforcement into Olmutz; even Bareuth's regiment would have been ruined, had not the battalion of Nimchewsky seasonably come to their assistance. This success of the Austrians made them fond of nocturnal expeditions: thrice they attacked the regiment of Ziethen at Kosteletz, who always repulsed them with loss. The independent battalions of le Noble and Rapin were not so successful. They belonged to the corps under the Margrave Charles, and were posted at Sternberg. They were to march to Bahrn, to cover the convoy which arrived on the 10th, and were so very roughly handled by the Pandours, that they lost three small pieces of cannon, and near 400 men. Mean while considering the succours that had been thrown into the town, and the enemy's position at Prerau, it was absolutely necessary to straiten Olmutz still more, on the other side of the Moraw. The corps under the Margrave Charles marched thither, and took post in such manner that its right kept possession of Commotau and the bridge there on the Moraw, and the left reached to the bridge of Hollitz.

A. D.
1758.Olmutz
reinforc'd.Olmutz straitened.

On the 20th Marshal Daun with his army came down from the hills, and encamped at Predlitz, between Wischaw and Prostnitz. A few days after, this general received advice, that the Prussians were bringing a large convoy from Silesia. The body of forces which escorted this convoy consisted of eight battalions, and near 4000 recovered sick, who were regimented for the sake of order in the march. The whole set out from Trossau on the 26th. Marshal Daun thought it his duty to avail himself of this opportunity to compel the Prussians, without the hazard of a battle, to raise the siege of Olmutz. For this end, he detached General Jahnus, who was at Muggitz, towards Bahrn, and ordered a detachment to march from Pargau to Stadt-Liebe, that the convoy might be attacked on two sides; and in order to deceive, he drew near to the Prussian army, placing his right towards Kojens, and his left at a little hill very near to Predlitz. However, this motion deceived nobody; and the safety of the convoy being the principal object, the King sent out General Zieten, with three battalions, two regiments of horse, and 900 hussars, to meet it. The convoy was attacked on the 28th, before General Zieten came up; but the enemy were repulsed and routed, and lost three pieces of cannon and some hundred men. Marshal Daun having sent a considerable reinforcement to the troops he had before detached, the convoy was again attacked on the 29th, between Bautsch and Domstadt. Four hundred waggons, four battalions, and about 1000 troopers, had scarce opened the march, and passed the defiles of Domstadt, when the enemy fell upon the convoy with their whole force,

A. D.
1768.

Prussian
convoy
taken.

force, both on the side of Böhra, and on that of A. D.
 Dembick. The head of the convoy was cut off 1759.
 from the rest, and, though General Zieten did,
 on this occasion, all that could be expected from a good officer, he was obliged to abandon his waggons, and retire to Troppa. The head of the convoy arrived at the army on the 29th in the evening. The enemy took near 600 prisoners, The loss.
 among whom was General Puttkamer. This unhappy event obliged the King to raise the siege of Olmutz; whereas, had the whole convoy arrived safe, the place could not have held out above a fortnight, notwithstanding the gallant defence of General Marshal, the governor.

Siege
 raised.

On the 1st of July the King, with his whole army, took the road to Bohemia. Marshal Keith brought away all his artillery, excepting four mortars, and one 34 pounder, the carriage of which was broke^d. This general marched by Littau to Muglitz and Tribau; the King marched by Konitz. The vanguard, under the command of the Prince of Anhalt Dessau, seized, at Leu-tomiffel, an Austrian magazine of meal and forage. The Generals Buccow and Laudon followed the army in its march, but without approaching too near it.

Prussians
 retire.

Leutomif-
 fel taken.

In this transaction there appears to have been great generalship exerted on both sides; by Count Daun to defeat the besiegers, and by the King of Prussia in raising the siege and in his retreat. Count

Remarks
 on this siege, &c.

^d The loss of men were between seven and 800 Prussians killed, wounded, and prisoners.

A.D. Daun being too weak to force the Prussians to battle, and to relieve Olmutz by a pitched battle, 1758. encamped his army in the mountains, between Gowitz and Littau, whose natural strength secured him from a surprise, and whose situation enabled him, in like manner as the situation of his camp at Kolin had done before, to receive daily reinforcements; to draw supplies of all necessaries from Bohemia; to intercept the convoys necessary for the essential success of the besiegers; to relieve the besieged occasionally, and to keep up their spirits for defence, till opportunity should serve to raise the siege.

In regard to Count Daun,

to the King of Prussia.

The extensive works of Olmutz, which the Prussians were obliged to invest, required a greater number of forces than were employed, to do it completely. This was the reason of so much success in the nocturnal skirmishes, by which the Austrians seldom failed to introduce provisions, ammunition and men into the town. The forage about the city had been previously destroyed. This obliged the Prussian cavalry to seek for it at a great distance; which not only fatigued, but exposed them to surprise from detachments out of the mountains. From whence also parties were continually alarming the camp of the besiegers, by night; and fell upon different quarters, while the garrison sallied with success to retard the operations of their enemy. However, this did not discourage his Prussian Majesty. Under all these difficulties, he finished the first parallel; and proceeded with such vigour, that the place seemed inevitably inevitably lost, when all his hopes evaporated in that one accident, the intercepting of the grand convoy near the defiles of Domstadt. A loss that was not to be retrieved by the Prussians in their situation, and without which it was both dangerous and in vain for them to persist in the siege.

A. D.
1713.

His Prussian Majesty deprived of the means to continue the siege, was now to retreat with such precaution, as might preserve his army from the accidents which commonly befall an enemy retreating with a powerful enemy at his back. Daun was prepared to seize every opportunity of advantage. But that general's vigilance and penetration were frustrated: the King maintained the siege with more vigour than before the loss of the convoy till the 1st day of July: when he suddenly decamped in the night, and instead of marching into Silesia, to protect that country from the insult of the triumphant enemy, ready to follow him with advantage, he took the rout of Bohemia, whose frontiers had been left unguarded by his adversary, and by this invasion he transferred the seat of war from his own into his enemy's dominions.

How this answered the end appears by the advantages his Prussian Majesty's arms gained in the execution of this plan. A large body of Austrians, under General Lacy, which were posted at Gibau, attacked a party of grenadiers, who occupied the village of Krenau, and made an appearance of their intention to dispute the pass: but they were soon dislodged: and there was an attempt to seize the Favourable skirmishes in his retreat.

A.D. the provisions and artillery in their passage over 1718 the hills of Hollitz. The enemy remonstrated General Retzow and his party, that assaulted them. But M. Keith coming up in due time, attacked the Austrians in the rear, obliged them to fly with precipitation, and took six officers and 300 men prisoners.

Königs-
gratz, &c.
Commanders

The King proceeded through Landaußel to the important post of Königsgratz. General Buccow had got there before him, with 9000 men well entrenched behind the Elbe all round the city;
 and had broken down the bridges over that river.
 His Majesty determined to attack the Austrian troops, ordered the bridges to be repaired with all expedition: which struck such a panic into the enemy, that Buccow retired, and left the King to take possession of Königsgratz without opposition. After which he had no more to do for his safety in this situation, than to disperse a body of Austrians, which had taken post between Königsgratz and Hollitz to intercept his artillery, &c. and that being effected, his whole army encamped near Königsgratz. So that notwithstanding the miscarriage before Olmutz, his Prussian Majesty found himself in a condition to stem the force of the Austrian army, and to lay Bohemia
 under heavy contributions, while his brother, Prince Henry, kept the army of the Empire
 in play, and from executing their design upon Breslen.

But if we change the prospect and look towards the Rhine, we shall see greater advantages. Prince Ferdinand,

Ferdinand, having refreshed his victorious troops, spent some time in fruitless exertions. He only waited till all his troops from distant quarters could be assembled: their rendezvous was at Mordau. They marched from thence to Dalsen, where the headquarters were fixed, on the 27th in the morning. While a detachment, consisting of several battalions and squadrons, together with Scheier's light troops, and Lucater's hussars, assembled on the 26th at Dursen and in its neighbourhood, under the command of Major General Wagenheim, who was charged with the dispositions to be made for the passage of the river, and with orders to advance himself to the gates of Dusseldorf, and to cause the corps under the command of Colonel Scheier to pass the Rhine at Dusseldorf. Which passage was executed in the night between the 29th and 30th, with such success, that Scheier having attacked, with bayonets fixed, the three battalions of French that opposed him, defeated them, and took five pieces of cannon, out of eight which they had. He had but two men wounded in the passage, and not one either killed or wounded during the action.

The army marched before sun-rise on the 20th from Dalsen towards Dorsten, and encamped at Limbecke; from whence, the next day, Lieutenant General Wutgenau was detached towards Wesel, with a body of infantry and cavalry. The 30th he encamped at Raefveld, and the 31st at Ringenbourg. The Prince left the army during its march from Dalsen to Limbecke, and went to Boeckholt,

A. M.
1752.
Prince
Ferdinand triumphs over the French.

A. D. Boecktholt, where he found the advanced guards 1758. of the body assembled at Coefveld. That advanced guard marched on the 30th to Emmerick; and was followed by the rest of the corps, which was employed at Vraffelt. About five o'clock in the afternoon of the 31st, the whole was in motion to cross the Rhine; the advanced guard went on as far as Lobit. The Prince's design was to pass the river in the night; but an unforeseen accident broke all the measures which had been taken for that purpose; and his Serene Highness was obliged to march the troops back again in the night to Neddlerelte. The 1st of June was employed in removing the obstacles that had occurred; and in the following night, the passage was again attempted, and executed with all possible success, near Herven.

Crosses the Rhine.

The hussars, with a detachment of grenadiers, passed, on the 2d of June, at two o'clock in the morning, in flat bottomed boats, which went and returned with so much diligence, that, besides the hussars, a regiment of dragoons, and ten or twelve battalions, were, before noon, on the other side of the river. During all this time, workmen were employed about the bridge, which however was not completed till four next morning. The remainder of the cavalry and infantry passed immediately, and marched towards Cleves.

Marches
towards Cleves.

The hussars, supported by the volunteers, surprized at first some patrols, which were made prisoners of war, and still continuing to advance, defeated the cavalry that shewed themselves, and took took a pair of kettle drums and a standard from the regiment of Bellefond. This country is entirely divided by dykes, so that it is as easy to dispute the ground, as it is difficult to advance. The enemy, sensible of this advantage, advanced with seven or 800 foot to stop the head of our vanguard, and fired some pieces of cannon upon them, which however hurt nobody. But a detachment of 20 men, having found means to slip along a dyke, and get possession of a house, which the French had, in part, passed, fired upon them, which had such an effect, that they retired immediately. The hussars with the like success penetrated and cleared the road quite up to Cleves; with no other damage, than five rank and file and two officers wounded. What confounded the enemy most was the loss of Keiserwaert, (with the greatest part of the garrison killed or taken) which they had engaged with the Elector of Cologne, to defend against any force.

The retreat of the French, on this occasion, was again so precipitate, that in order to escape the hussars, they skulked for many miles in the inclosed grounds, and made a way over hedges and ditches to escape their pursuers. But Prince George of Holstein Gottorp, with a large body of cavalry and dragoons, came up with them near the castle of Muyland, and made a considerable booty and a good number of prisoners; and at Goch he seized a magazine, and 100 prisoners more.

Yet there was no probability of forcing the strong camp and entrenchments of the Prince of Clermont

A. D.
1752.

Pursues
the French

Endeavours to bring on a general engagement.

A. D. 1758. mont at Rhinefeldt, with an army so inferior in numbers. But what could not be done by strength was to be supplied by the generality of his Serene Highness; who, by his well-judged motions, which he ordered his army to make off the 12th of June, turned the left wing of the French army towards the convent of Campe, and obliged their commander to quit his boasted camp of Rhinefeldt, or Rhineberg, and to retire towards Meurs, in the night between the 12th and 13th. This point gained by Prince Ferdinand, his Highness gave a new position to his own army, and occupied the heights of St. Anthony's mountains on the 14th. On the 15th, about five o'clock in the morning, His Serene Highness was informed, that the enemy was advancing in four columns upon his right. His Highness immediately ordered three guns to be fired as a signal, and the whole army was under arms, in order of battle, a quarter of an hour after. He went afterwards himself to reconnoitre, and saw distinctly, that, at about two leagues distance from his right flank, a considerable body was coming over the plain of Hulste, and marching towards Crevelt. Not knowing whether this body was followed by the whole army, or whether it was only a detachment of it that was marching that way, His Serene Highness halted till towards the evening, when he received certain information, that the French army had marched towards Nuys, and that the Prince de Clermont had only detached this corps, under the command of Lieutenant Ge-effected.

How

General Count de St. Germain, in order to take post at Crevelt, which was the first camp in the living camp.

Upon this information his Highness sent his light troops and hussars to Kempen and Wachten denek, and ordered the army into their camp again.

On the 16th, he changed the position of the army.

On the 17th his Highness went himself to reconnoitre towards Kempen, the position of the enemy's detachment at Crevelt, but could not guess at their reason for fixing this detachment at such a distance from their army. In order, therefore, to be better informed of it, and to see the countenance this corps would hold, he ordered the Prince of Holstein, with ten Prussian squadrons, the five squadrons of hussars, and the three battalions of Sporcken guards, and Prince Charles, to march early in the morning of the 18th towards Kempen, whilst the Prince of Holstein should advance with his corps towards Hülste: whereby it would clearly appear, whether M. de St. Germain would retreat towards the army, or whether the army of Prince de Clermont would advance towards Crevelt, in order to encamp there. Agreeable to this plan, his Highness the Hereditary Prince of Brunswick set forward on the 19th from the camp, with 12 battalions. He marched directly towards Kempen, from whence he could perceive no alteration in the position of Count de St. Germain.

At six o'clock in the morning, his Serene Highness Prince Ferdinand in person followed the Heseditary Prince to Kempen. He perceived some movements in the flying camp, which were of a nature to induce him to believe, that M. de St. Germain designed to march against the Prince of Holstein, who was encamped near Hulfte. Soon after he was positively informed, that the whole of the French army had quitted Nuys, and were advanced on this side Crevelt: on which, having taken his measures, and formed a plan, as the case required, Major General Wangelheim was ordered to advance early the next day, with his corps towards Hulfte, and Lieutenant General Sporken was directed to march after midnight, with the army, and to advance likewise to the plain between Hulfte and Kempen. On the 20th of June all the troops his Serene Highness could dispose of, were, by this means, reunited in this camp, the right of which extended towards Kempen, and the left towards Hulfte. The head quarters were fixed at Kempen; and, in order to prevent any useless movements, his Highness ordered the quarter-master-general not to regard the rank of the different corps, nor the order of battle, but to place the regiments as a great part of them were actually posted.

16 D
1758

On the 21st was observed a great movement in the advanced corps of Count St. Germain, and about ten in the morning, after decamping, they filed off to their left, and marched towards Anrath, where they joined their grand army.

In making this motion they abandoned the town of Crevelt, which was on the front of their right wing;

which the Prince de Camille had only retained this day, under the command of Lieutenant Ge-wing; the Hanoverian chasséurs possessed themselves of it directly, and his Highness also went himself there to reconnoitre the position of their camp, which was clearly discovered from the steeple at Crevelt. He did not think fit either to keep the said post, or to make any change in the position of his army; in consequence of which, he ordered the chasséurs and hussars away from that place, and the enemy repossessed themselves of it an hour afterwards.

On the 22d his Highness went again to reconnoitre the camp of the enemy, particularly on the side of St. Anthony, on the heath, which led towards their left. And although he found many difficulties, principally on account of the country's being very woody, and having inclosures surrounded with large and deep ditches, he resolved to march the next day to the enemy, and attack them in their camp.

In consequence of this resolution, the army was ordered to be under arms on June 23, at one in the morning, and not to change any thing in the camp, but to leave all their baggage in it, and wait there for further orders.

He assigned the command of the whole left wing, consisting of 18 battalions and 28 squadrons, to Lieutenant General Spörcken, and gave the command of the right wing, composed of 16 battalions and 14 squadrons, to the Hereditary Prince and Major General Wangenheim; which, by the addition of the two regiments of Prussian dragoons, Holstein and Finckenstein, of five squadrons

Order of battle.

A. D. 1758. squadrons each, made a corps of 24 squadrons, to be commanded by the Prince of Holstein, as the infantry was by the Hereditary Prince.

At four in the morning, the army began to move; the right advanced in two columns as far as St. Anthony, and the left the same distance, on the plain leading to Crevelt, half a league short of it, where they halted to receive fresh orders. His Highness Prince Ferdinand went up the steeple of St. Anthony, and sent for the two Princes of Holstein and Brunswick. There they observed at leisure the position of the enemy's camp, where all was very quiet. He also sent for several persons thither, who were acquainted with the country, to learn from them by what routs he could advance towards the enemy; and being informed of many other points, absolutely necessary to be known, his Highness resolved to march to the right, and endeavour to come up with the enemy by the villages of Vorst and Anrath, on the flank of their left wing. But, in order to raise doubts in the enemy, as to the side on which the real and principal attack would be made, he gave orders for Lieutenant General Sporcken to send Lieutenant General Oberg, with six battalions of the second line, Hodenberg's and Bremer's regiments of horse, and that of the body guards, towards St. Anthony, and to give them six 12 pounders. Besides this, his Highness gave orders, that when the action should begin on the enemy's left, M. de Sporcken, by way of Crevelt, and M. d'Oberg, by way of St. Anthony, should do their utmost to advance and penetrate into the enemy's army; but however not to venture too far, unless they should be assured that his attack succeeded to his wish. His Highness chiefly recommended it to them, to make good use of their heavy artillery, in order to oblige the enemy to employ their attention as much upon their right wing and center, as on their left, and to engage and divide their attention equally in three different places, which would prevent them from sending any reinforcement to the real attack, for fear of weakening themselves in some part or other, where an impression might be made.

A.D.
1738.

His Highness's particular directions about the artillery.

The dispositions being made, his Highness put himself at the head of the grenadiers of the right wing, at eight in the morning, and taking the road that leads to the village of Vorst, which he left on his right, the army advanced in two columns towards Anrath, where there was a detachment of 400 of the enemy, half horse and half foot, who, after some discharges of musketry on each side, fell back towards their camp, which was not above half a mile distant from them, and there gave the alarm. His Highness then caused the troops to advance, and double their speed to get out of the defiles; he ranged them in order of battle in the plain, between the villages of Anrath and Willich, and marched directly towards the wood which covered their left. Before Prince Ferdinand gave the order for attacking, he lifted up his eyes to heaven for near a minute, and then drawing his sword, said, "Brethren, we Advanceth in two columns.

Attacks a party of the enemy.

Forms the line of battle.

A. D. 1758. "have a good cause, put your trust in Providence,
 "you see God is with us, the wind is changed,
 "and it is now on our side."

His speech to the soldiers.

Engages the enemy

At one o'clock at noon, the enemy began to act. The Duke caused his artillery forthwith to advance, which, being greatly superior to that of the enemy, facilitated the means of his infantry's forming themselves over against the wood, and of his cavalry's extending upon his right towards the village of Willich, making a shew as if they designed to turn the enemy's left flank, to take them in the rear. After a cannonade as violent as it was well supported, his Highness saw plainly that he must come to the point of endeavouring to force the enemy out of the wood by small arms; wherefore the Hereditary Prince put himself at the head of the first line, that is to say, of two battalions of the grenadiers of Schulenbourg and Schack, of the regiments of Block, Sporken, Hardenberg, Wangenheim, Post and Dreyes; and advanced, with the whole front, directly towards the wood. The fire then became there extremely hot on each side, and neither discontinued, nor, in any degree diminished, for two hours and an half. In the mean while all the other battalions entered likewise the wood; so that there remained but eight squadrons, which formed a corps of reserve upon the plain, ready to be employed where circumstances should require.

The other sixteen squadrons, which were upon our right, never could penetrate on the other side of the wood, on account of two batteries, which the enemy had placed there, and which were sustained by above 40 squadrons. In short, about five o'clock in the afternoon, the Hereditary Prince, assisted by the Major Generals Kulmansegge and Wangenheim, gave orders for an attack to be made, by the grenadiers, upon the two ditches that were in the wood, and that were lined with the enemy's infantry: and they were forced one after the other. The other regiments of infantry did the same all along their front. By which means part of the enemy's infantry was entirely thrown into confusion, and retired out of the wood in the utmost disorder, without ever being able to rally. The Hanoverian foot followed them, but without venturing to pursue them, on account of the enemy's cavalry, which, notwithstanding the terrible fire of our artillery, not only kept the best countenance possible, but even covered their infantry that was flying, in such a manner as to protect them from our cavalry, that, between five and six in the evening, had found means to gain the plain. The Hessian dragoons, and the regiment of cavalry of the same nation, had two shocks with the royal carabineers of Provence, and the regiment of Roussillon, and broke them. This was all that the cavalry had to do in this day. A squadron of the carabineers attempted to penetrate through our infantry, and attacked the battalions of Post and Drevet, but with a considerable loss; and though about 40 of them did indeed force their way, they were never able to

A. D.
1758.

Enemy
driven out
of the wood.

A. D.
1758The flight
of the
enemy.

rejoin their corps, and were all killed either by shot or bayonet.

The enemy then did not think proper, or find themselves in a condition, to dispute the ground any longer, but retired towards Vischell, and from thence took the road that leads towards Nuys. In the flight they lost a great number of men and horses.

During this whole affair, the fire of the artillery of the Generals Sporcken and Oberg had done great execution, but as the distance they were at made them uncertain as to the turn affairs had taken on the Prince's side, they never ventured to attack the enemy's front, opposite to them; so that the enemy's right wing and center retired, in the greatest order, towards Nuys, leaving the allies masters of the field of battle, after a loss on their side of between seven and eight thousand men killed, wounded, and taken prisoners.

Loss.

Such was the end of this action, which cost our army 10 officers, 17 subalterns, 269 common men, and 97 horses killed: 15 officers, 38 subalterns, 701 common men, and 55 horses dangerously wounded: 19 officers, 38 subalterns, 372 common men, and five horses slightly wounded: 93 soldiers, and 27 horses missing. So that the whole killed, wounded, and missing, amounts to 44 officers, 93 subalterns, 1375 common men, and 184 horses. On the side of the French, the chevalier de Muy, Lieutenant General, received three wounds, one on the head, and two in the arm; the Count de Gisors was mortally wounded;

as was also the Count de Maille, colonel of the regiment of Conde. The Duke de Montmorenci, colonel of the regiment of Touraine, was also dangerously wounded, as was likewise the Count de Lauraguais, colonel of that of Rouffillon. Colonel Lochman had his arm broke. Lieutenant-colonel Escher, with four captains and seventeen other officers of the same regiment, were likewise wounded. Six or eight regiments were entirely ruined.

A. D.
1738.

There were found on the field of battle two uniforms with the ensigns of the order of the Holy Ghost; nine pieces of cannon, eight four pounders, seven standards, two pair of kettle-drums, and twenty-two officers of distinction were taken in the pursuit. When Prince Ferdinand went the next day to view the field of battle, and the principal officers made him their compliments upon the victory, he said, with tears in his eyes,

Prince Ferdinand's
humanity.

"Gentlemen, I beseech you say nothing more of that kind; look upon those bloody carcases, that deform the field: this is the tenth that in the course of my life I have seen, and I sincerely pray God it may be the last."

The light troops were sent to harass the enemy's retreat; and at nine in the evening all our three different corps joined each other in the field from whence the enemy had been driven, and remained there all night under arms.

It was said that the French were 65,000 strong, and the British army not more than 30,000; that the French were forced against their will to fight;

Strength of both armies.

and

THE GENERAL HISTORY OF

and that they ran away, lost their tents, baggage, and cannon.

Prince

* The following is Count de Clermont's relation of the battle on the 23d of June at Crevelt.

" On the 22d his Serene Highness the Count de Clermont having received advice that the enemy, who were encamped from Kempen to Hulse, were preparing to come and attack him, he made the proper dispositions for their reception. On the 23d, at ten in the morning, his Serene Highness was informed that several columns of the enemy were in sight, marching up to his camp. He immediately put his whole army under arms. The right extended to the wood at Vilchelon, from whence it lined the Landverth as far as the farm of Hokenxmeij. A little farther, in the same line, towards Aarath (in which was the royal legion) he posted four battalions. He also placed opposite to the farm of Hermeldeck, a reserve, consisting of carabineers and dragoons. On the right was another service, composed of the grenadiers of France, and the royal grenadiers, and the brigade of Navarre. Behind the foot, in the center, were two lines of horse. Crevelt was occupied by a detachment of 800 foot, horse, and hussars.

" Such were our dispositions, when the enemy presented themselves, approaching insensibly to Crevelt on the right, to Aarath on the left, and to the farm of Hokenxmeij in the center. His Serene Highness, after some skirmishing, made the detachment at Crevelt, which was posted there only to watch the motions of the enemy, fall back upon the line. He also made the royal legion join the left wing.

" About noon the enemy made their dispositions for attacking us in three different parts. They fell on Aarath first, which could not be defended, because it was too far distant from the left of our line. From thence the enemy advanced to the plain between the Niers and a small wood that runs parallel to that river. His Serene Highness had lined this wood with 15 battalions, composed of the brigades de la Marine, de Touraine, and the detached regiments of Brancas and

Loch-

Prince Ferdinand resolved now to lay siege to A. D.
Dusseldorp, a city that belonged to the Prince 1758.

Palatine; The siege of Dusseldorp,

Lochman, and 30 squadrons, in order to oppose the enemy, if they should attempt to advance that way.

The enemy began their three attacks at one time. His Serene Highness soon perceived that their real attack was that in the wood on the left. He sent for the reserve, which consisted of the grenadiers of France, the royal grenadiers, and the brigade of Navarre. But by an inconceivable fatality, the officers, whom his Serene Highness ordered to bring up these brigades, misled them, and this reserve did not come up soon enough. The fifteen battalions, after sustaining a fire of three hours, and repulsing the enemy three times, were at last obliged to fall back, after suffering great loss, and causing the enemy to suffer a greater, who finding the fire of our infantry slacken, drew up in the plain. His Serene Highness ordered the carabineers and the two battalions of horse of Royal Roussillon and Aquitaine to charge them. The enemy were driven back to the wood. But as they had their principal force in that part, and could bring up fresh troops every minute, they again poured into the plain in greater numbers; and it was no longer possible for the cavalry to attack them with advantage.

As the reserve which his Serene Highness sent for did not come up, he gave orders for a retreat, which was made in the greatest order, the enemy not daring to follow us, and our army arrived at Neufs without being annoyed in the least on its march. We brought off our wounded. His Serene Highness judging his position at Neufs to be improper, either for waiting for the enemy, or for marching to them, is come, after halting there one day, to encamp at Worringen.

The people at Paris received the news of this defeat with the utmost concern: a letter written on that occasion will serve, in some measure, to shew their despondency. "We know not, says the writer, precisely the amount of our loss; but it is certain the enemy gained the field of battle.—Mean while, till we are informed of the particulars of this fatal day, and

of

A.D.
1758.Bombardment.

Palatine; but lent to the French for a place of arms and magazines; garrisoned with 2000 men. In this measure his Serene Highness had two views; either to destroy their magazines in this town and make the garrison prisoners; or to force the army to risk its complete ruin, in their relief. Accordingly, on the 28th, he appeared before Dusseldorp, and summoned it to surrender: four batteries were erected, and plied the town very briskly with bombs and bullets; so that, in the space of five days they beat down and reduced 80 houses to ashes, and damaged many more, amongst which were the Elector's palace, several churches and other public and stately buildings: under whose heaps of rubbish many persons perished. On the 3d of

of the true causes of this new disgrace to our arms, whilst we deplore the loss of so many gallant men, we cannot help attributing it to the levity and passion for pleasure that prevails at present; and which are attended with dissipation, incapacity, and continual craving. Instead of studying their duty, and qualifying themselves to discharge it; instead of attending to the welfare and interest of their country, and strictly following the King's intentions and commands, we see, to the disgrace of the nation, that most of the leading men in our army have minded only the enriching themselves by the desolation and ruin of the enemy's country, and whilst they authorize by their example, and for their own private gain, corruption and frauds in the commissaries, they have destroyed an army, which, under a Marshal Saxe, would have given law to all Germany. Hence we see the Bastille fill: three officers of high rank are just now sent thither, and no less than twelve were lodged in it before. These acts of just severity will, we hope, bring back the ancient spirit of honour, discipline, and oeconomy, by which our generals and officers were distinguished in former times."

July.

July Prince Ferdinand being applied to by the principal burghers, for leave for the towns people to withdraw with their effects, a suspension of arms was granted for a certain time: during which, the governor, having no expectations of relief, capitulated for the garrison to march out with the honours of war: but an immense quantity of stores, ammunition, provision, and a numerous and fine train of French artillery, were delivered up with the city.

Capitulates.

The battle of Crevelt and the loss of Dusseldorp finished the command of the Prince of Clermont, for he was superseded by M. de Contades, who was charged with the command of the French forces on the Rhine, till the arrival of M. de Estrees, restored. But all this adverse fortune did not divert the attention of the French ministry from their original plan of operations against those countries from which their grand army had been so lately driven with such disgrace. Prince Soubize was ordered to march with the army under his command, and to penetrate into the Landgravate of Hesse. But he was not able to execute these orders with the success his court expected. For, as his vanguard attempted to take post at Otterheim, between Jessen and Marburg, the Hessian militia came suddenly upon them, and killed or took them prisoners, though they were a select corps drawn out of two regiments and Fischer's troops. Had this defeat been properly improved by the regular troops then assembling under Prince Ysenberg, Hesse would Prince of Clermont gives up the command to M. Contades.

Prince Soubize marches for Hesse.

His van defeated by the militia.

A. D.

1758.

Motives
for Sou-bize's
march.

would have had nothing more to fear from a French invasion.

Motives
for Prince Ferdinand's conduct on this occasion.

This march of the Prince of Soubize was intended to drive Prince Ferdinand back from the Rhine, or at least to divide his forces for the defence of the countries of the British allies. But his Serene Highness had formed a counter plan, either to cut off Soubize's army in Hesse, or to oblige him to come to the assistance of M. de Contades. For this purpose Prince Ysenberg had orders to oppose the progress of the French on that side, with every art, without risking a battle; till the last push, and in the most advantageous situation. By this means his Serene Highness hoped to gain time, till he should be strengthened with the British troops, consisting of 2068 men, and 3000 horses, which had embarked, and were daily expected in his army, by the way of Embden. In the mean time his Serene Highness marched to Ruremond on the Maese, with a design to transfer the seat of war into the enemy's country; which, seconded by the naval operations on several parts of the coast of France, was expected to oblige Soubize's army and all their forces to hasten back from Germany, to defend their own country. How this excellent plan failed will be seen in the course of this history.

A plan that seems to have been concerted with the British ministry, and by them formed upon the most obvious and most apparent circumstance to promise success, when our army was flushed with victory, and had passed the Rhine, and the French in no condition to stop their progress, without manifestly weakening every part of their German plan of operations.

A3

As soon as our ministry received advice of the victory gained by Prince Ferdinand at Crevelt, and of the surrender of Dusseldorp to his arms, he was ordered to maintain his station, with promise of an immediate reinforcement of British troops, which he had long solicited; and with them to penetrate into the enemy's country, as soon as he should have notice of the execution of a secret expedition, then under consideration to favour his operations.

A. D.
1758.

British
troops ordered for Germany.

The troops, in number 2068 men and 3000 horses, were shipped off for Germany, and arrived at Embden on the 20th day of July^s, under the command of the Duke of Marlborough and Lord George Sackville, who preferred this service on the continent, (as more agreeable to their own sentiments in favour of a continental war) to any connections with naval operations on the coast of France: And this dislike to expeditions against the coast of France diffused itself so fashionably amongst the friends of continental measures and the military officers, that the government was at last driven to such an alternative, that they must

Embark-
ed.

The generals and regiments of horse and foot, sent to Germany, to join the army on the Rhine, under the command of Prince Ferdinand of Brunswick, Generals: Duke of Marlborough, Lord George Sackville, Marquis of Granby, General Waldegrave, General Sir John Whiteford, Major-General Kingsley.

Horse. Blue's, Bland's, Howard's, Scott's Grays, General Cholmondeley's, Sir John Mordaunt's.

Foot. Napier's, Kingsley's, Hulke's, Hume's, Stuart's, Brudenell's, from Embden, replaced by 400 invalids.

either

A. D.
1758.

General
Bligh, why appointed to the command against Cher-
bourg.

A descent resolved on by the minister.

Why?

The commanders
by sea and
land.

either accept of a general, that had scarce ever been remembered amongst the rewards of merit, who was now sent for from Ireland, upon a quite different command and service, and almost worn out in the service of his country, and with age; or give up the thoughts of a littoral war upon France.

The minister, reduced to this dilemma, was too well convinced of the expediency and necessity of this kind of attack upon our enemy, either to be discouraged by the bad countenance with which the last expedition had been conducted in the enemy's country, or to be compelled, by the resolution of the military gentlemen, not to resume the plan of another descent upon the same coast. A miscarriage under the present circumstances would be more advantageous to the national interest, than no attempt. A descent must be made to cause a diversion in favour of our allies; to engage the enemy to employ in their own defence a considerable part of their forces; and to disturb and shake the credit of their public loans: a Bligh, or a ———, with the character of an honest and brave soldier, trained up in the art of war, and in the service of his country, was as capable of this command, as any of those great names that had rejected the offer. Time was precious: the service was necessary: the minister did not hesitate a moment. Lieutenant General Bligh, who had been sent for from Ireland to command the troops going to Germany, was greatly surprised on his arrival at London, that his destination was changed for the command of this expedition,

tion, which had been refused by those concerned in the former: however he was appointed to the command by land, who thought it his duty to accept thereof; and got ready in three days after, to carry his instructions ^a into execution, though

A. D.
1758.

Secret instructions for our trusty and well beloved Thomas Bligh, Esq; Lieutenant General of our forces, whom we have appointed General and Commander in Chief of all and singular our troops and land forces, appointed or to be appointed, for a secret expedition for our service; or such other officer, on whom the command in chief of our said troops and land forces may devolve. Given at our court at Kensington the 18th day of July, 1758; in the thirty-second year of our reign.

Having by our commission, bearing date the 13th day of this instant, appointed you to be General and Commander in Chief of all and singular our forces appointed, or to be appointed for a secret expedition; for your better discharge of the great and important trust thereby reposed in you; we have judged it proper to give you the following instructions.

I. You shall, immediately upon the receipt of these our instructions, repair to the Isle of Wight, where we have appointed ships to convey you, and the forces under your command, to the coast of France; and so soon as the said forces shall be embarked, you shall accordingly proceed without loss of time; under convoy of such of our ships of war as shall be judged proper for that purpose: And our trusty and well-beloved Richard Howe, Esq; whom we have appointed Commander in Chief of our said ships, is instructed to co-operate with you, and to be aiding and assisting in all such enterprizes, as by these our instructions, you shall be directed to undertake, for our service.

II. Whereas we have determined, with the blessing of God, to prosecute the just war, in which we are engaged against the French King, with the utmost vigour; and it being highly expedient, and of the greatest utility, to continue some expedi-

A. D.
1758.

though he foresaw the uncertainty of the event; for the people at Cherburg, the only place fixed upon in

tion, that may cause a diversion, and engage the enemy to employ, in their own defence, a considerable part of their forces, destined to invade and oppress the liberties of the Empire, and to subvert the independency of Europe; and, if possible, to make some effectual impression on the enemy, which, by disturbing and shaking the credit of their public loans, and at the same time securing and protecting the commerce of our own subjects, by striking at the principal seats of their privateers, as well as by disconcerting, and in part frustrating, their dangerous and extensive operations of war, may reflect lustre on our arms, and add life and strength to the common cause: our will and pleasure is, that you do exert your utmost endeavours to land, if it should be found practicable, with the troops under your command, at or near Cherburg, on the coast of Normandy, and to attack the batteries, forts, and town of Cherburg; and in case, by the blessing of God upon our arms, the said place shall be carried, and that our troops shall be able to maintain themselves there a competent time for demolishing and destroying the port and basin, together with all the ships, naval stores and works, batteries, fortifications, arsenals, and magazines, thereunto belonging, you are to use all possible means, effectually to demolish and destroy the same; and you are also to exert such other efforts, as you shall judge most proper, to annoy and distress the enemy. — When this service shall be completed, or in case the attack abovementioned on Cherburg shall not succeed, our will and pleasure is, that you do proceed to carry a warm alarm along the coast of France, and to make descents upon any part, or parts thereof; and attack any place, that may be found practicable, from the easternmost point of Normandy, as far westward as Morlaix, inclusive; and you are to carry into execution all, or any of the above operations, in such order of time, as from the circumstances of the wind and weather, shall be most advisable, and most conducive to our service:

and

In his instructions, having been already alarmed, were prepared to receive him: besides the number

A. D.
1758.

and whereas the diversion hereby proposed to be made, is of the highest importance to the good of the common cause, our will and pleasure is, that you do continue with as much vigour, and give as much duration to the various operations of the present expedition, as shall be found practicable, and consistent with the good of our service, as well from the strength and tenable tenure of any place or post, whereof you may become master, as from the force, which the enemy shall collect in those parts, to oppose you, and from the circumstances and situation of our troops and ships; during which time, you are to exert all such efforts for annoying the enemy, as you shall judge proper; and you are in all cases, to preserve, with the utmost attention and circumspection, the communication with our ships.

III. Whereas the success of this expedition will very much depend upon an entire good understanding between our land and sea officers; we do hereby strictly enjoin and require you, on your part, to maintain and cultivate such a good understanding and agreement; and to order, that the soldiers under your command, should man the ships, when there shall be occasion for them, and when they can be spared from the land service; as the Commander in Chief of our Squadron is instructed on his part, to entertain and cultivate the same good understanding and agreement, and to order the sailors and marines, under his command, to assist our land forces, and to man the batteries, when there shall be occasion for them, and when they can be spared from the sea service; and in order to establish the strictest union that may be, between you and the Commander in Chief of our ships, you are hereby required to communicate these instructions to him, and he will be directed to communicate those he shall receive to you.

IV. You shall, from time to time, and as you shall have opportunity, send constant accounts of your proceedings, in the execution of these our instructions, to one of our principal

A. D. 1758. of troops had been diminished about one third part by sickness; and three of the best battalions were sent to Germany, from the forces employed at St. Maloes. The command by sea was given to Richard Howe, Esq; now Lord Howe; whose behaviour on former expeditions, and alacrity in this service, had in a particular manner recommended him to the favour of his sovereign: and in order to prevent the contagion of disgust which might have spread itself, from the infection propagated by the late command, the late army, General Highmores Prince of Wales, now Duke of Cumberland, attended with many thousands of nobles, gentlemen, and gentlemen of fortune, to the countenance of the expedition with Cherbourg described.

Cherbourg is a small and clean town, situated for the most part on the arms of the sea, and sea ports, and is by its situation, and improvement, a French town, and is famous for great ships, situated in the most dangerous and scourge of the British coast, and is the most of our navigation in the channel. The town is situated in a plain, within the district of La Hague, on secretaries of state; from whom you will receive such further orders and instructions as we may think proper to give you.

V. In case the circumstances of our troops under your command, on any urgent necessity, should require leaving the coasts of France before you can receive our orders for that purpose, you are, in case of such necessity, to return to England, and land the troops at such of our ports as shall be most convenient.

His Royal Highness EDWARD Duke of York.

His Majesty King Edward Duke of York

the north side of Lower Normandy, and in that part of the province known by the name of the Peninsula Cotentin, at the bottom of a large bay, formed like a crescent, by the Capes Barfleur and La Hogue. On the north it is bounded by the sea: on the east by a large plain, about three miles long: on the west by another plain, about a mile and half in length; and on the south by an agreeable prospect of fruitful ground, and the hill of Roule, on whose summit is the great forest of Brix and Turlaville; about 70 miles from Portsmouth.

A. D.
1758.

It was always looked upon as a place of some consequence, both for defence, and for annoying the British coast: for which purpose it had been well fortified. But in 1687, Lewis XIV. with the advice of Marshal Vauban, gave orders to have it fortified in the modern way, and to add a capacious basin to the harbour, for the reception of a large fleet of men of war. In consequence of this resolution the new works were immediately begun, and the wall was carried a great height in the year 1688. But in the following year both the old and new fortifications were demolished; nothing remaining but two towers, part of the old fortifications; one of which was converted into a magazine of gunpowder.

A place
of consequence.

The town contains about 6000 inhabitants. Out of which is formed a militia, consisting of four companies, commanded by a major, an aide major, four captains, four lieutenants, and four ensigns or second lieutenants: and a party of this

Inhabitants, &c.

Strength.

A. D. militia, draughted out of each company, mounts 1758. guard daily.

Here are five forts upon the bay; the Turlaville redoubt, the Longlette, the Galette, the Equerdreville and the Cherseville. In time of war, a fourth part, and sometimes one half, or more, of the citizens are obliged to keep constant guard in the Galette, the most considerable fort; because the ships shelter themselves under this fort, till they get water enough to carry them into the harbour. The Turlaville is situated S. E. of the town, the other forts towards the W. and N. W.

Harbour;

The harbour lies on the E. and S. sides of the town, and the entrance to it is S. and N. The tide here is 13 or 14 feet, at high water: at low water there remains no more than the water of the river: and it is secured from the violence of the N. E. winds by the island of Pelee, which lies at the mouth of the harbour to the N. E. in extent 400 fathoms from N. W. to S. E. and 300 from E. N. E. to W. S. W. Within was the basin, which with the piers, had cost the crown of France upwards of one million sterling.

Expedition fleet
sails.

Against this place Commodore Howe, with his fleet and transports, Lieutenant-General Bligh, and his troops on board, set sail from St. Helen's on the first day of August. They arrived in Cherbourg road at seven in the evening, on the sixth of the same month: and in an hour's time the bombs began to play upon the town. At seven next morning the fleet got under way, and at nine came to an anchor in the bay of Marais, two leagues west of Cherburg, where about 3000 of the enemy, horse and foot, appeared behind the sand-banks, as if they intended to dispute the landing of our troops. But the dispositions being made for a descent, the grenadiers and guards landed in flat-bottomed boats, about two in the afternoon, under the covert of a smart fire from the frigates, bombs¹, sloops, and armed cutters. His Majesty's troops, having made the shore, Land. formed a stand with all the cheerfulness imaginable, under the command of General Drury, who marched them up to the post of the enemy, and received three fires before he began the attack; which was executed with such spirit and vigour that the French quitted their post, and were pursued with great slaughter, especially amongst the horse, skulking in hedges and ditches; with the loss of only twenty men killed and wounded on our side. Here also were taken two pieces of brass cannon, drawn down to this beach to oppose our troops in their landing. It was not till next morning that the horse and artillery landed: which was effected without molestation. The army immediately formed, and at noon marched forward in two columns to Cherburg; and as they approached the garrison abandoned the place: so that our army entered and took possession thereof without opposition, there being no fortifications to defend it next the country.

Surrenders.

¹ Which were charged with a great quantity of balls, and did great execution amongst the French cavalry.

A. D.

1758.

A promise of good discipline.

Remarks
on the conduct of
the commander.

A manifesto was published, which contained promises of good discipline and protection to those who made no resistance. This quieted the apprehensions of the inhabitants, and kept them from deserting their habitations; and contributed much to that civility, with which they received their English guests; and almost exceeded the caresses of the best friends.

But neither the march from the landing-place, nor the behaviour of our army under those fair promises, have escaped censure. As the enemy hovered about, and their numbers were not sufficiently known, it was thought a little inconsistent with that maxim in war, never to occupy any ground, but where you can exert your whole force to the best advantage, for the Commander in Chief to encamp and hamper his troops in such a confined situation, that the ground on which they laid all night did not exceed 400 paces: So that had the enemy attacked them in the front, or on the left, they would have been obliged to fight with infinite disadvantage; the tents being pitched in a crowded and irregular manner. It was owing to the same inattention that the inhabitants had cause to complain of the outrages committed by our soldiers. It was not sufficient to prevent disorders by a mere prohibition or command. It was necessary also to encamp regularly with the bulk of the army, in order to have the soldiers superintended. For the want of this precaution, discipline grew relax, the soldiers lived at large and indulged themselves like brutes

in

in riot, licentiousness and plunder. A breach of faith very unbecoming the English^k; and which had well nigh proved very fatal to themselves; for had it not been through the strict discipline with which the foot-guards set a laudable example of sobriety, the whole army were in danger of being cut off, in that dissolute scene of drunkenness, that ensued a discovery of the wine magazines; though there was a body of the enemy's troops, superior to them, under a marshal of France, and within a few hours march.

General Bligh being now in possession both of the city of Cherburg, and of the forts of Querqueville, Homet and Galette, proceeded, according to his instructions, to destroy the bason¹ and the

Bason, &c.,
destroyed,
and artillery, &c.,
taken.

^k See the note on p. 85. Vol. III.

¹ The masonry of the bason and jettys was so strong, that the miners found it extremely difficult to enter it with their tools. But what was the most curious of all, was the sluice. It was constructed by the famous M. de Caux, chief engineer to the present French King, and was about forty French feet broad, and 162 long, erected upon a bottom of hard sand, two or three feet deep, under which was a bed of marle, and, seven or eight feet deeper, a bank of solid rock, of unknown thickness. To lay the foundation, so as not to be incommoded by the sea, the whole space was first of all encompassed by a dam, five feet thick, coated with free-stone, and lined with clay, the whole laid upon a bed of heath-broom, especially towards the sea, to prevent the sand from washing away. On the side of the port, there was a small sluice, made by way of precaution, to let out the water, to be raised by machines, when the tide was out; lastly, to the depth of sixteen feet, was made an excavation, sufficiently wide for the workmen to turn with ease every way about the 1758.

A.D.

the two piers at the entrance of the harbour, also to ruin the harbour itself, that it might be rendered the foundation. It was not without many obstructions that the depth was gained, for innumerable springs broke in upon the works, so that twelve chain-pumps were constantly employed, and those scarce sufficient to clear away the water, though they delivered at least 180 cubic toises per hour. When the dam was surrounded by the full tide, they were forced to have recourse to five other pumps, or mills, with vertical chaplets sixteen feet high, and six or seven feet diameter.

This excavation was begun by portions of about three fathom wide, and, when they came to a sufficient depth, piles were driven down, on which to fix the vertical mills. As the column of water to be raised was fourteen or fifteen feet high, winches were applied of a proportionable strength. Thus the whole extent of the sluice was drained and hollowed out in about six months, but the erecting the masonry, &c. took up some years.

The massy parts of the masonry, of about four feet square each, were strengthened and more firmly connected by iron cramps, fixed in with melted lead. Particular care was taken to chuse the hardest of free stone, scarce any less than three feet, or three feet and a half cube, and the ordinary cement was made in the following manner:

Equal parts of the hardest tile shards, fragments of free-stone, and scorix from iron founderies, were powdered and sifted, and, when cleared and dried, were mixed together, and a kind of bason formed, in which they slaked about half the quantity of quick lime, and let it lie some hours; after which they mixed all well together, and placed it on a stone or wooden platform, to be beaten once a day with batts edged with iron, till the cement was reduced to a soft paste.

For filling up the joints of the free-stone-facings of the sluice, they used a cement made of equal parts of test-powder or pieces of crucibles, sandever, and smiths forge scales, all reduced to powder, to which about half the quantity of slaked lime rendered incapable of receiving and covering any of the King's ships of war, and to demolish all the batteries, forts, magazines and stores at that place and along the coast. There were seven and twenty lime was added. This composition was mixed with the same precautions as the former, and a quantity of the large red snails without shells were beat up into a paste with the powder.

A. D.
1758.

On one of the sluices were found the following inscriptions:

On the east side.

Hanc iussit Lodovix, suavit Floræus, et undis
Curavit mediis Asfeldus surgere molem;
Non aliis votis alme præsentior urbis.
Ars frenavit aquas, fluctus domuitque minaces,
Hinc tutela viget, stat copia, gloria crescit,
Hinc rex, hinc sapiens, herosque manebit in ævum;

On the west side.

LUDOVICI XV. Jussu, FLORIÆ Consilio,
ASFELDI Ductu,
In Ævum stat hæc Moles.

Ars, naturæ victrix, aquarum impetum refrænât, facillem navibus tempestate actis aditum dat, tutelam affert, copiam invehit, gloriam perpetuat, simulque principem, sapientem, heros, posteritati commendat.

In English, thus;

Louis and Fleury trust to Asfeld's care
Amidst the waves to raise this mighty pier.
Propitious to our pray'rs the fabric stood,
Curb'd the fierce tide, and tam'd the threatening flood;
Hence wealth and safety flow, hence just renown,
The king, the statesman, and the hero crown.

This

A.D. 1758. twenty ships in the harbour, which were burnt. One hundred and seventy-three pieces of iron cannon and three iron mortars were destroyed, and twenty-two fine brass cannon and two brass mortars were sent to England, with the colours taken

This work, By the command of Louis XV, The advice of Cardinal Fleury, And the direction of Count Asfeld, Shall endure for ages.

Here art has subdued nature, set bounds to the raging waves, opened an easy passage to ships in distress, ensured safety, invited wealth, and perpetuated the glory of the monarch, the minister, and general.

PARODY. By an officer in the expedition.

Louis and Fleury must, with Asfeld now,
Resign to George, to Pitt, to Bligh, and Howe.
One blast destroy'd the labour of an age;
Let loose the tides, and bid the billows rage;
Their wealth and safety gone, their glory lost,
The king's, the statesman's, and the hero's boast.

A return of the brass and iron ordnance, &c. At the batteries beyond Querqueville, great and small, 5 iron ordnance; at three batteries on this side ditto, 8 twelve and six pounders, iron; at Quasqueville, 3 twelve pounders ditto; at Homet, 5 six pounders ditto; at Querqueville, 6 twelve and fourteen inch iron mortars, 1 brass ditto; at Fort Galette, twenty-four pounders, 4 of brass; at ditto, sixteen ditto, 4 of ditto; at ditto, twelve ditto, 3 of ditto; at ditto, fourteen inch mortars, 2 of ditto; on the road to Cherburg, twelve pounders, 3 of ditto; at Longlette, 3 twelve pounders, iron, and 1 iron fourteen inch mortar; in the town of Cherburg, of different sizes, 10 brass, and 52 iron ordnance; at the Sandhill intrenchment, 15 six pounders, iron; at Fort Touraeville, 2 forty-two pounders, iron, and 1 brass fourteen inch mortar.

1111

Total

taken in this expedition. In the mean time that the engineers, assisted by the officers of the fleet, and artillery, were employed in the demolition of this harbour, &c. the light horse were detached to scour the country, and to lay it under contribution. But by venturing too near the camp, which the enemy was forming, and every hour reinforced, at Walloign, about four leagues distant from Cherbourg, there happened several skirmishes between the out-parties of each army, in one of which the brave Captain Lindsey, one of the most intelligent, active and industrious officers in the service of the light horse, was wounded by a musket-shot; of which he died universally regretted.

A.D. 1748

Several skirmishes

to some of the

The

—Total 22 brass ordnance, 99 iron ditto, 3 brass mortars, 2 iron ditto. Destroyed at Fort Galette, thirteen $\frac{1}{2}$ inch shells 400; at ditto, shot of different kinds 6000; at ditto, flint, casks 1; at ditto, lead shot, casks 2; powder left for the use of the engineers destroying the forts, barrels 17; ditto destroyed, with a great quantity of stores and shot thrown into the sea, at the redoubt at Tournayville, barrels 13; filled cartridges for forty-two pounders 40; one large gun; shells of fourteen inches 211; destroyed at Fort Galette, small arms 113; at Cherbourg, ditto and musketballs 300; at Homet, pounds powder 21,000; at Cherbourg magazine, ditto 27,000; match, tons 4.

They brought hostages for the payment of 18,000 l.

The general, attended by some of the commanding officers, going out to reconnoitre, with a detachment of grenadiers and a party of light horse, some of the French cavalry appeared at a distance. Captain Lindsey, of the light horse, was immediately ordered to attack them, at the request, as it is

A.D.
1758.

Troops
reimbark.

Importance of this blow.

The first object of General Bligh's instructions being performed, the troops re-imbarked on the 16th, and continued two days in the harbour without seeing an enemy to molest or harass them in their retreat. And notwithstanding any cavils about the conduct, and delays, for which some blamed the commander in chief, it must be allowed, That the importance of this blow was not only considerable by the damage done the enemy; but it gave life and spirit to our people: it made them feel their own legs again, and to look a Frenchman in the face, without any of those apprehensions that had grown out of past miscarriages. It was now we saw cannon and colours, trophies taken off the walls of our enemies, carried in triumph through the metropolis of the British

is said, of some young gentlemen, who were desirous to see the horse engage; he advanced with a brisk pace, without detaching from his front and flanks; and, filling in with a body of infantry posted behind a hedge, received a severe fire, which obliged the light horse to wheel about and retire.

On Saturday, the 16th of September, the cannon and mortars brought from Cherbourg, having been exposed for some time in Hyde-park, passed by his Majesty, and set out from Hyde-park, and came through the city in grand procession, guarded by a company of maitresses, with drums beating and fifes playing all the way to the Tower, where they arrived about four o'clock in the afternoon. There were twenty-three carriages, drawn by two hundred and thirty-one horses, with a postilion and driver to each carriage, in the following manner: the first, drawn by fifteen grey horses, with the English colours and the French underneath; seven ditto, drawn by thirteen horses each; nine ditto, by nine horses

British empire: a spectacle to which this generation had been a stranger; and the first enterprize upon the coast of France, for several ages past, which had done honour to our country, and brought disgrace upon the French.

A. D.
1758.

After considering his instructions, the commander in chief found that one principal view, in sending out this armament, was to make a diversion of the enemy's forces, to continue a warm alarm along the coast of France, and to make descents on any part from the easternmost point of Normandy, as far westward as Morlaix, inclusive; Grenville most naturally offered to be the next object of his operations. But when he considered that the enemy had no longer occasion

Reasons
for Bligh's ulterior
operations.

horses each; three ditto, by seven horses each; one ditto, by five horses; then the two mortars, by nine horses each. These pieces were finely ornamented with the arms of France, and other hieroglyphics, such as trophies, &c. finished in a masterly manner: their names, exact weights, and nearly their bore, are as under, except the mortars:

Cannon	wt.	Inches in bore	Cannon	wt.	Inches in bore
Hecube	4000	6	Antonin	5740	6
Nitocris	4080	ditto	Insensible	5660	ditto
Emerillon	5320	ditto	Mailfaillant	5500	ditto
Temeraire	5680	ditto	Vanquer	5670	ditto
Augusta	5770	ditto	Juste	5490	ditto

In the second line.

Ulyssé	2353	4½	Sage	4346	5
Foudroyant	3314	5	Violente	4150	ditto
Renomyne	3367	ditto	Furieuse	4160	ditto
Laborieux	3303	ditto	Impetueuse	4130	ditto
Diligence	3960	ditto	Devineressé	4000	ditto
Moresque	3986	ditto

for

A. D.
1758.

for a garrison or troops, to guard the town and country about Cherbourg, and that there were ten thousand forces already assembled for the protection of Normandy, and that they could easily fall down towards Grenville, and move over to Caen, and to the other parts of that coast, so as to render an attempt almost impracticable: and being further informed, by advices sent from our ministry, that an attempt upon Morlaix would be attended with great disadvantages, there being a great number of forces stationed at Brest and in that neighbourhood, ready to oppose a descent upon that coast; General Bligh's future operations were prudently confined within a very narrow compass, which, upon the best intelligence, were resolved to be attempted against St. Maloes by landing at St. Lunaire, about two leagues west of St. Maloes.

Resolved
against St.
Maloes.

Driven on the coast of England.

They put to sea on the 18th with this intention; but were driven by contrary winds upon the coast of England, and on the 23d came to an anchor in Weymouth road. Next day they weighed, and after some contention with the winds, they proceeded and made the French shore, on the 25th of August: But could not reach the place of their destination till the 3d of September in the evening, when the fleet came to an anchor in St. Lunaire bay. On the 4th the troops were landed without any opposition, but with the loss of eight men drowned, who were overset. They Arrived and land at St.

Lunaire,
on the coast
of France.

Some accounts say, five men and forty-five firelocks. The weather was very doubtful. So that on the first day there were only sixty light horse and two field pieces landed: nor could they bring any more for the succeeding days.

marched

AD.
1758.

Several methods proposed.

some intelligence, to deliver that in case of necessity, his troops might be able to open the way and reconquer the place by storm, as he was.

The ships at St. Belles being under way, and the point of St. Dinar, and the whole western coast of the Rante, opposite each other, being observed, and found without any cannon for its defence, a council of war was assembled to consider of the practicability of the attack, in which it was observed, that as the body of troops now landed was greatly diminished from what there were in the late expedition, it was impossible to invest the town on both sides of the Rante, as they would only invest it now on the west side, by placing ships at St. Dinar, which the pilots, who were acquainted with the coast, thought very practicable.

These methods were then proposed, of moving from thence to the opposite side to Esterné and St. Servant. The first, which the pilots imagined would be practicable also, was moving the flat-bottomed boats in the night (a number acquired on the coast of a fortified island) along the shore of St. Dinar, up the river, opposite to Fort a Chaut, a little above St. Servant, and there to carry the troops over. But, there was, a French

The mouth of the river, which forms the Rante, is two miles over in its narrowest part, so as to be out of the reach of land batteries. The town was also surrounded with very strong, or small, vessels, which gave considerable difficulty to the ships, entering the channel, to be able to be erected on the shore: and fifty large cannon, or batteries, defended the entrance.

A. D.
1758.

VIII. A.

1758.

1758.

1758.

1758.

1758.

1758.

1758.

1758.

1758.

1758.

1758.

1758.

1758.

1758.

1758.

1758.

1758.

1758.

1758.

1758.

1758.

1758.

1758.

1758.

1758.

1758.

1758.

1758.

1758.

1758.

1758.

1758.

1758.

1758.

1758.

1758.

1758.

1758.

1758.

1758.

1758.

1758.

1758.

1758.

1758.

1758.

1758.

1758.

1758.

1758.

1758.

1758.

1758.

1758.

1758.

stance of war with four other vessels, and a Duple. going to the point of employment, to destroy them; but this method could be put in execution. The circumstances would occasion delays, and the great difficulties being started, independent of this, the first method was rejected. The ships were ordered to go round by Duple, about eight or ten miles from the shore, and landing the artillery, four near Paramé, and disembarking the troops at St. Lomair, and landing them again near Paramé, together with the artillery. This method of these methods could be effected without the immediate aid of the men of war, and would in such a situation as to cut off the communication with Duple and the western coast. The weather made this measure also impracticable. The commander not only assured the general that it was impossible for him to give him assistance to bombard the town, without hazarding the loss of all the men of war, and the chain of rocks that lie in that harbour, but that the weather would not permit him to be any longer at the place where the troops disembarked, and that he must sail for the bay of St. C. before he could take up the troops, and be enabled to disembark, it being with the greatest difficulty that he had landed the provisions, and sent a boat off with a message to the fleet.

Dangerous anchorage of the fleet.

Proceeds to St. C. bay.

Proceeds to St. C. bay.

Attack of St. Maloes dropt.

See the note on p. 88. Vol. III. See also p. 91. ib.

A. D.
1718.Army
retreats.

The

Skirmishes

The
of the
of the
of the
of theOrders to burn and destroy.

The

The General therefore ordered the army to de-camp early next morning, and they began to march towards the Bay of St. Esprit. The enemy now appeared in small parties, and harassed our army by firing out of the woods, by which we lost two men, and had several others wounded.
Our army encamped on the 9th in the evening,
about half a mile from the village of St. Esprit, intending to feed the river Espirit, and to fight the place in the morning. The enemy all night parties kept our camp under arms all night, by their frequent alarms, but did them no damage. The peasants and some regulars took post at St. Esprit, on the other side of the river, as if they had resolved to dispute the passage with our army.
However, as the soldiers who were posted there saw each other, without doing any harm, and up to the middle, and got over the river of a brisk fire, with the loss of one man and one officer killed, and several wounded. One of the soldiers lost their muskets in the night, and were almost drowned, being let out with two poles. The General sent a detachment to acquire the commencing officers, that if they did not do it, he would reduce all the villages he passed into ashes.
The Friar did not return with the soldiers, and the General gave orders accordingly to burn and destroy every place in his march.

This river is passable only for about two hours at low water, and the flood is dangerous on account of quicksands.

The

N

When

A. D.
1758.

March to Matignon

Skirnið

Crucially of the French
to their back story.

Arrives at Mstignon.

and best in the
the an-years of Intel-

When the general had passed the river, the sun was low in the sky, by which, for low water, the only time for crossing the rapid river. Therefore, it not being advisable to advance by night, the country was left until dark, and the army, especially the heavily armed division, remained in the strength of the river, the enemy's troops, the general ordered them to advance a little way westward from the river in the rear, and without any communication from the enemy. But now the advanced guard, of three hundred grenadiers, under Colonel Clarke, on their march, were met about eleven o'clock, by five companies of French regulars, dragoons and infantry, who kept at the distance of about 150 yards, moving off gradually, as our men advanced, without any firing on either side. They drew up in the inclined round, the camp of Malignant, but upon Colonel Clarke's firing his grenadiers, and detaching
some parties to flank them, they immediately retired.

The army came up to Malignon about one o'clock, without doing any thing, but finally decided, that unless ordered to leave our flank, one of which a swimming cow had made signal to surrender; but that not being readily perceived, one of our thinking parties shot and killed the officer and some of the men, and then moved on.

A. D.
1758.

Why encamped
there.

Here was the post, which the general had designed to maintain, as long as he was able, in order to alarm the country, and contribute, as much as possible, by this means, to their calling off troops from Germany; his instructions directing him to continue with as much vigour, and to give as much duration to the various operations of the present expedition, as should be found practicable. For this purpose he ordered a camp to be marked out for his army, about half a mile on the left, of the town. Upon the muster it was found that there had been lost, this day, about thirty men, of whom eleven were made prisoners.
One escaped back again, and reported that his comrades had been put to death in a most barbarous manner.

Cruelty of the French
to their prisoners.

Malignon was about a league from St. Cas.
All the army encamped on this spot, except the grenadier companies, which covered the town on the other side; and the second regiment of guards, which the general sent to St. Cas for provisions, particularly for bread; and together with this detachment he ordered Colonel Cunningham, chief engineer, to reconnoitre the beach, and see what would be proper to be done, in case he could not maintain his ground.

Intelligence of the enemy's
strength
and designs.

Several deserters came to our camp in the evening; and by them, and some prisoners, particularly a French dragoon, taken by the piquet guard, the general was very well informed, that the enemy was encamped about two leagues off; that their army consisted of several regiments, collected

lected from different parts of the province, even from Brest, and that neighbourhood: and that they were to be joined by the garrisons of other towns, especially that of St. Maloes, which were hourly expected in their camp, and that they were determined to give the English battle next morning. Thus the French army was represented vastly superior to ours: and it was further remarked, that it was in their power, either to give battle, or to retire, till such time as they could be sure of overpowering us by numbers. 3 or of making

The French forces were very numerous. The following is an authentic list of them.

French Generals.

Le Duc d'Aguillon, commander in chief.

Marquis d'Aulignè, lieutenant-general.

Marquis de la Roche,

Marquis de la Tour d'Auvergne,

major-generals.

Regiments of infantry from Brest.

Battalions.

Men.

Bourbon

2

1400

Royal Vaillans

3

1400

Royal Buffs

2

1400

Brisson

1

700

Bris

1

700

Penthievre

1

700

9

6300

Dragoons.

Squad,

Mahvert

2

Militia, gardes de cote,

5000

and armed peasants

Cannon

8

Mortars

2

A. D.
1758.Retreat
resolved
upon.

making our retreat extremely difficult and hazardous. The general officers, for these reasons, were of opinion that it was proper to march next day, and to embark the troops without loss of time: except Lieutenant Colonel Clarke, the quartermaster-general, who advised the disembarkation of the rest of the light horse and field pieces, and advancing to attack the enemy without delay: however the majority prevailed. Orders were accordingly issued for the whole army to continue all night under arms: and the general sent his aid de camp immediately away to Lord Howe, to inform him of his intention to march the next morning, and to embark the troops, as soon as the naval preparations could be made for that purpose.

This night a party of the enemy alarmed the piquets: but after receiving the fire of one of the advanced posts, they fired a few shot and retired. It was resolved to march by break of day. But at one o'clock the enemy beat to arms, and some deserters came over, who informed us that the French were contriving to get between our army and the ships, and so to cut off our retreat. An information greatly suspected, to be contrived by the enemy, to frighten us away, rather than with a view to save us from being cut off. Be that as it will; this hastened our retreat, which, with an coming at our heels, ought to have been conducted without noise, in the most secret and silent manner possible. But a little before day the general was ordered to be heard, and the army, consisting as this time of 6000 men, marched off the ground at break of day in one column only, and saw no appearance of an enemy attempting to break in between them and the water side; except that the grenadiers, which formed the rear-guard, were obliged to exchange some shot with the advanced parties of the enemy.

The regiments that joined these troops from St. Maloes, the evening before the attack, were upwards of 3000 regulars, foot and dragoons, besides militia.

A. D.

1758

The army
marched to the water
side.

It was nine o'clock before the troops began to embark on the beach of St. Cas: when about four battalions were got on board, the advanced parties of the French appeared on the high grounds.

An account of the re-embarkation
of the troops.

The embarkation continued very quiet, till the French had formed themselves out, by degrees, through the enclosures: and when they saw themselves, both as to situation and numbers, capable of attacking our remains on the shore, with success, they brought their field pieces to bear, and a shocking carnage ensued of our men; not only on the shore, but in the boats, though Lord Howe did all in his power to cover them by a sharp fire from his frigates and bombs; there being none of our artillery on shore.

The account of this affair is a very tender point: and as it has been related with several marks of prejudice, we will collect the facts from all the narratives of this expedition, and lay them impartially before the reader. First let us hear what what has been published under the name of the commanding officer, who says, "After the Generals Mowbray, Desjardins and Elliot were on board the ships, with their several brigades;

 and after the greater part of General Drury's brigade, which was the 1st brigade, had been embarked, I went on board with those whose duty it was to attend me, there being no other troops, then on shore, but the rear guard, composed of the grenadiers commanded by Colonel Griffin. My anxiety for the troops made me stay perhaps longer than I ought", and contrary to my duty.

Some parties of the enemy moved down from the high grounds on the right, and General Drury went with three companies of the first regiment, which was all of his brigade that was at that time ashore, to the assistance of the rear-guard. The beach was about three quarters of a mile long, with a sand bank in front, almost as advantageous for us, in many places, as for the

This letter was published on the 4th of November, and gave great offence at court, on account of the postscript, &c.
 where Lord L. — is mentioned. Wherefore, on the 8th an advertisement signed Thomas Bligh appeared, declaring in general, that he disavowed several particulars in this letter.
 However, it was still reputed a genuine apology for his conduct, by himself or order.

Prince Edward also continued on shore till Lord Howe commanded him to return to his ship, in which his Royal Highness acted only as a midshipman.

"enemy

“ enemy, though they had formerly a bad kind of “ a port, made to prevent our landing in that “ bay, which was but imperfectly destroyed.
 “ While our troops were covered by this sand “ bank, the frigates fired with great facility, over “ them, upon the enemy. So that had the ar“ tillery been brought ashore, in all probability it “ would have been lost, and could have been of “ no service, but by obstructing a much greater “ fire, and a but 200000 100 100 100 100 100 100 100
 “ Some of our companies of grenadiers moved “ up to the top of this bank, and fired upon “ some of the enemy, who were coming down and “ forming from the heights, which killed a great “ many of them, and threw them into confusion:
 “ but fresh troops of the enemy advancing, they “ retired to the shore.

As Dr
 1754

“ The rear-guard, the three companies of the “ first regiment included, consisted of about 1100 “ men, of whom were missing about 700, and
 “ of those between four and 500 were prisoners.
 “ The number of killed and wounded among
 “ the enemy, according to their own most mag“ nificent accounts, was more than double their “ number.

“ Such is the relation of this transaction, under the supposed direction of the general in chief.
 Let us now collect what was published under his name, and Commodore Howe's, and by other parties concerned in this enterprise. An officer of the marine informs the public, That his ship joined Lord Howe on the 13d of September, four leagues

By others.

A.D.
1758.

league west of St. Mills, and the next morning the ships being embarked in the flat-bottomed boats, stood in for Passerough Bay, about two leagues to the west of St. Mills, where they landed without opposition, under the cover of the Rose frigate and the Swallow sloop, except a few guns, which were fired from a battery on an island, on one side of the bay, which did drop without doing any damage. There were orders given next morning for two frigates and a bomb to attack a battery on a peninsula, which some of our troops endeavoured to force by land; but that service was countermanded, because the Commodore thought it impracticable without hazarding the loss of the ships: yet this very battery was taken by a party of marines on the 9th, without any loss.

General Blyth, in his letter of the 13th to the Secretary of State, refers to a former report he had mentioned the necessity of the fleet's quitting the bay of St. Louis, and its proceeding to St. Croix for shelter, he says, of being down on shore against the rocks, the wind blowing hard upon the shore, that his army marched on the 9th to St. Guillo, on the 10th to Matignon, to meet the fleet, which lay out beyond St. Croix Bay, to get provisions: that in the evening he did receive intelligence that there were twelve battalions of foot and two squadrons of horse at Sandwich, on march to attack him, which came from Brest: that with the assignments which of the general officers he despatched, having sent to the Commodore done so be prepared to receive his troops, marched on the 1st of September in the morning; and that the troops marched up the beach as fast as they arrived, as the flat-bottomed boats being ready to receive them on the shore, that the enemy did not appear on the height above, till about an hour

after his troops began to embark, so that they soon after began to fire with their cannon, but did not attempt anything down, till almost all the troops were embarked, except the grenadiers, which made the rear-guard of the whole, who marched up to oppose their advancing, and behaved with great bravery and resolution; till, overpowered by numbers, they were at last obliged to give way, and retired to the water-side, till the boats could come to take them in; where they suffered much by the enemy's fire, and some of the boats were sunk.

A. D.
1758.

Attack
on the enemy.

The first
of the ship
going.

Lord Howe's relation of this critical time of embarkation, thus to the Right Honourable WILLIAM PITT, Esq; That the former corps
were taken off without any considerable interruption from the enemy: but in their attack upon the rear-guard several of his officers and men were made prisoners, and some were wounded and killed.

Other

Which was not till nine in the morning.

• List of the ships, and names of the officers, who were taken off the ships, from the Bay of St. Cuthbert, on the 1st of September, 1758.

Belonging to the Fleet, one French killed, one wounded—
To the Rochester, Mr. Somerville, Second Lieutenant, killed, —, midshipman, wounded; seven French killed, several wounded.

At 2.
1781

Attacked
by the enemy.

Fire from the shipping.

Other accounts are more particular: six frigates, four brigs, and two sloops stood into San Cas Bay, to cover the re-embarkation of the troops, who were formed near a windmill, on a hill about three quarters of a mile from the beach. At nine in the morning the enemy began to march down to the boats, which lay ready to embark them. By eleven two thirds of the army, the wounded men, the English horse, a great many mortars, and the artillery were on board, when a body of the enemy's horse first appeared on the top of the hill, and a little afterwards a much larger number of infantry occupied the ground round the windmill. When the enemy moved to descend, the bomb ketches played upon them with great success, particularly the Granada threw a thirteen inch shell so right as to oblige the horsemen to dismount, their horses becoming unmanageable; and the mortars being charged with pound shot, did great execution amongst the infantry also, and wherever they fell. But at half past eleven they opened a battery of six pieces of cannon, near the windmill, from which they kept a close fire on our troops while embarking, till they were obliged, by the number of shells thrown from the wounded. — To the Portland, Captain Mapleton, taken; Mr. Lindsey, midshipman, wounded. — To the Montague, Captain Rowley, slightly wounded and taken; two seamen wounded. — To the Jason, Captain Pason, taken; one seaman wounded. — To the Salamander, Captain Elphinstone, taken. — To the Speedwell, two seamen wounded. — Total of seamen killed, eight; wounded, seventeen.

ketches,

A. D.
1758Militia
of General
Drury.

reached to the shore for a while towards St. John's, and to defend the hill under the castle of St. John's,
 in which the Irish brigade took post. But the continual shower of balls from our ships and ketches, soon found them out, dislodged them, and forced them back to their first post, where, at twelve o'clock, they opened a battery of cannon behind a hedge, on the right of the hill, which was but
 of a small duration: for it was so severely mounded
 by a continual fire from the ships, that it was silenced after they had thrown and fired three or four shells, which did some damage and no more.
 They again took off to the ship, and got possession of the village of St. John's half way down the hill.
 This obliged General Drury, who had with him
 the grenadiers of the whole army, to the assistance of two, and four companies of guards, to draw them upon the beach to cover the battalions while embarking: and the enemy, ten times exposed to the fire from the ships, left the village, which was set on fire by a cannon, and got possession of a hollow way which obliquely covered them. They went down (on both sides and in front) where were peppered so closely, and only with small shot, but such small shot, as one pound weight, (of which the Granado only expended about 3000) fired at the rate of one or two at a time, one of large mortar,
 that they made a great slaughter, and intimidated
 the French soldiers so, that their officers were obliged to drive them down before them, like sheep to slaughter. For some hundreds of them were killed in their descent to this hollow way by the shipping.

A. D.
1757 Misconduct of General
Drury.

Attacked
by the enemy.

Fire from the shipping.

shipping, before the armies engaged. It was now that General Drury formed his divisions in two divisions, and marched to attack the enemy, as they defended. But, by a mistake, this brave resolution turned to their destruction. For the peasants had thrown up a sort of dyke, to keep out the sea from overflowing the country; which reached from one side of the beach to the other,
the whole extent of the bay, and served as an excellent breast-work on either side from the enemy. As he intended making this use of it, the marching of General Drury's division over this dyke, was intended to break the attacking within pitch, they were rendered useless to the enemy, and lost the advantage to the English. He certainly should have sent his grenadiers and waited the enemy's approach, behind the dyke, where he could do his best work, or at least the enemy driven up to the side of the dyke, and a good superiority on the other side. The first great success side of grenadiers gave the first great killed every Frenchman as he advanced. (the beach being covered with their dead and wounded) and would probably have driven them back, having made them give way twice, but not the continual shot and brought them back to the charge; and our three companies having expended all their ammunition, General Drury was at last obliged to give way in his turn. Now he perceived his error, for, in this time of need, the second division could not get over the dyke time enough to sit down the first,
which was entirely broke; and but a few got back,
with

THE LATE W.A.R.

with great difficulty. This out the society in for tation of the style. That which they need with a continuance upon the ground is. There was now no alternative. The only person in the
of want of food. The only person in the
of want of food. The only person in the

LORD VISCOUNT HOWE.

A. D.
1756.

have been lost. No men in the world could be have with more bravery than ours did on this deperate occasion. Some of them turned about and unhinged their pieces, while they stood almost to their chin in water, and then threw off their accoutrements and clothes, and chose rather to swim for their lives, than be taken prisoners.

When they saw no retreat left for our men on shore, they mounted the dyke, and by a vast superiority of numbers, drove those who remained into the sea; most of whom were either drowned or killed; the few from the ships being able to cover their retreat. Several had been wounded, our men would have suffered as much, or more thereby than the enemy. A few found shelter under a rock, and were afterwards by our soldiers and as soon as the first assault drove the ships, the French gave quarter to those who threw down their arms.
In this manner, the French were driven from the shore.

General Dury, who was on the shore, and being helped by a grenadier, pulled off his clothes and taking to the water, was drowned. Mr. William Smith, who was second in command over the grenadiers, saved himself by swimming two miles, in his clothes, to the shore. Sir John Arncliffe, a volunteer, was first upon a rock, on which he swam for shelter.

List of officers who were present

Guards. Lord Frederick Cavendish, Lieutenant Colonel Pierfon, Captain Dickens, Captain Hyde, W. Lieutenant-Colonel Lambert, Ensign Sir Alexander Gordon, Captain Pownall. — Lord George Blandford, Captain Hume, Lieutenant Blandford, Cornwallis, — Lieutenant Rice, — Effingham's, Captain Brown-
low, Lieutenant Whyly, Lieutenant Denbire, — Captain

...be recorded to their eternal in- A. D.
...the French pretended 1778.
...and compassion to the wounded,
...of a most inhuman action, that
...When our boats were all
...the cowardly villains, says an
...kept firing whole platoons on some
...that could not swim, and stood
...above water, to be acciden-
...up by the boats of such vessels as laid
...the shore which the seamen attempted
...with the risk of their own lives.

Remarks
on this expedition.

The conduct of those concerned in this expedition was assigned before the bar of the public with great freedom. The impropriety of landing the troops at a place, in unsettled weather, on a beach, from whence, except the wind blew directly from shore, and that but slightly, it was impossible to re-embark them in time of necessity, and where they could not even effect the landing of the artillery, nor communicate with the fleet,

Captain Taylor, 200 W. 1st St. Lieutenant Rife, 1117 E. 1st St.

Opera House, Levee and Grand—Richmond. Belmont

Price, Lieutenant Lambourn, doubtful. Grenadier Guards.

Captain Bridgman, Captain Matthews, Captain Odwell.

wounded.

Life of Officers Killed.

North of Station was destroyed from fire.

Major-General Duff. — Guards: Captain Walker, Ensign

1861-1862. - Lieutenant William H. Hay. - Captain

Mann's, Lentz, Mart, Jones, W.

Richmond's T. L. Eastman, Drummond, Gamble, & Co.

Elephant Drummond's Greater Gerd Cap

13-00000 2:00 300 10 140VAT 11 101122111

but 1980

100

100

100

A.D.

1758.

but under the most hazardous circumstances; was said to be departing from that wisdom and ability, which had, on all former occasions, recommended the commander at sea to the favour of his King and country. The commander by land was also impeached for exposing his army to the manifest hazard of being distressed for provisions, and of having his retreat cut off by the enemy; and for want of more caution in his retreat, before an army, of whose great superiority he had certain intelligence. Matignon was a full march out of his way from St. Lunaire to the bay of St. Cas: and the beating of the general in the morning of his retreat, was publishing his intentions to the enemy, who, he was informed, was providing to give him battle that very morning. And if it be true that a proposal was made to the general to embark the force from a fair open beach on the left, between St. Guildo and St. Cas, his rejecting that advice, and adhering to those rash measures that followed, will do no honour to his memory. The marching with drums bearing, and in one column, which exposed our army to a variety of accidents, that should have been particularly guarded against in their circumstances; and especially that delay, with which their march, of three miles from the town of Matignon, was protracted from three in the morning till nine, before they arrived on the beach of St. Cas, are most unaccountable facts. The dispositions for their embarkation has not escaped public censure. It is allowed, by way of alleviation in favour of the noble commander, that he had received no proper notice for the rebarkation: but it was certainly a great oversight in such an urgent case, where expedition was the greatest means of safety for the army, that the boats did not push the men they took up, on board

he

the ships nearest in shore; but on the contrary,
they through a punctilio of disposition, consumed much time in carrying the men to their respective transports, riding at the greatest distance, and some boats were most idly employed in carrying off horses and cows instead of men, in defiance of the sea officers. Besides, much blood had been saved, if the cutters and small craft, which lay idle, had been ordered in shore to the assistance of the troops. It is a pity that General Drury's memory should suffer for the intrepidity and bravery
by which he ventured and lost his life in the cause of his country. But he is blamed for suffering the French to disengage themselves from the hollow way, without disputing the passage with them, with bayonets fixt, which was advised. Then, for-quitting the dyke or breast-work with a handful of men to attack them, drawn up in a formidable front, without hopes of his being able to stand against superior numbers: instead of retreating,
as he was advised also, along the beach to a rock
on the left: in which retreat the right flank would have been covered by the entrenchment; and the fire from the shipping might easily have prevented
the enemy's pursuit along the shore.

In reply to these imputations there appeared an apologetical letter, wherein the commander in chief

A. D. A chief is said to say, "Every operation in war 1798: "must appear to different men in very different "views; much to men of capacity, sublimity and "experience. The greater part of mankind,
 "the military not excepted, judge without re"flection, and from trifling little views and cir"cumstances, which either are of no consequence,
 "or which must often happen in every operation,
 "by the very nature of war. — However, I am "convinced in the present case, that the real cause
 "and first spring of many people's reflections on
 "my conduct, is my success at Cherbourg: such
 "is the present melancholy situation of our country.
 "If I had acted the part of an ignorant coward,
 "and dishonest man, I should have found friends
 "and protection, where I found none. — I am very "far from imagining, that I have not committed
 "faults and errors. The greatest generals in all "ages, to whom I have not the smallest preten-"sions to be compared, have confessed that they "have committed the greatest mistakes every
 "campaign. — For my part, when I considered
 "the difficulties of acting with vigour upon the "coast of France, with the number of troops un"der my command, greatly diminished from
 "what they were upon the late expedition, I was "very sorry that his Majesty was obliged to have "recourse to me, and to desire me to accept of a "command, which had been refused by so many
 "general officers."

See the letter from the Honourable L. — G. —
 B. — gh, to the Right Honourable W. — P. —
 The

The severe treatment of our forces, on this retreat, had so greatly weakened them, and the hazard foreseen by Lord Howe for the anchorage of the fleet on that part of the French coast, at this season of the year, till the further supplies provided, could be taken on board, if sent for, and the troops put again into a proper state of service, determined him with the General's consent, to return for this purpose to any port he should be most able conveniently to gain in England. Therefore, having by a message, obtained leave of the Duke d'Aguillon, who commanded the French, to bury our dead, which was done the next day; they sailed the day after for England, and arrived at Portsmouth on the 18th.

A.D.
1758

Return to England.

The French account of this affair gasconades pretty much, in regard to their own bravery and conduct, and to the loss on both sides; but they that read it will find enough in the enemy's own relation to confirm the good opinion of the bravery of our men, who, though but a handful, maintained an engagement an hour and a half with the whole force of the enemy.

French
account of this affair.

Various

* See Lord Howe's letter, dated the 12th of September, to Mr. Pitt.

† He also sent a list of his prisoners, which is given on p. 219.

‡ The following relation of the affair at St. Cass was published at Paris, September 23, by authority.

§ The Duke d'Aguillon Having received information, the 5th instant in the evening, at St. Matthew, near Brest, that the English fleet, after having shown itself the 3d, about a league to the north of St. Malo, where it cast anchor on the

A.D.
1733.

Effects of this miscarriage.

Various were the effects of this miscarriage.

The reception this news met with at home, will remain

as it is; but the French court, at this 3d, had, on the 4th, landed at St. Briac a body of 12 or

14,000 men, he dispatched couriers to the several commanders in that province, to march towards St. Briac with the troops under their several commands, except the garrisons of Belle Isle, L'Orient, Port Louis, and the Garde Cotee of Nantes.

That corps, which was encamped near Brest, began to move

the same evening, and proceeded directly to Lamballe, where,

on the Duke's arrival on the 6th, he learnt, that the enemy had pitched their camp between St. Briac and Dinant, and had posted detachments at Ploehaly and Pleurtin, two leagues from Dinant. On this intelligence, he ordered the troops, which

M^r d'Aubigny had brought from Treguier, and which had reached Lamballe by two forced marches, to proceed the same evening to Dinant. On the 5th it was occupied before noon.

The 8th, in the evening, the Duke learnt that the enemy, who had left their camp at Briac that morning, were marching to the right in order to reach the Guillo, and pass it next day at a ford about a league from Plancoet. Upon this he determined to harass them upon their march.

The 9th, the enemy passed the Guillo, and encamped between St. Jagoel and the wood of Val.

The 10th, at break of day, the enemy arrived at Matignon, and encamped. The regiments of Bourbon, Brillac, Bresse, and Quercy, who arrived the night before at Lamballe, advanced from thence to Henan, a league from Matignon. The Count de Balleuoy joined them there with two squadrons of dragoons, and took the command of this column. The second battalion of the regiment of Penhalovic advanced from

Jugen to Plancoet, and Messieurs d'Aubigny and de la Chastre had orders to join them and pass the Guillo. About noon

the Duke d'Aguillon came from Henan, with a large detachment, to Matignon, to reconnoitre the position of the enemy,

whom he found very advantageously situated, and impossible on that side.

remain a lasting monument, and a most admirable picture of the times. Almost every man of consideration

A. D.
1458.

On the 14th, the enemy, who during the night had made their dispositions for a retreat, began at day-break to fall back to St. Cae. M. de Bruc followed close at their heels, and sent advice of it to M. de Balleroy, who marched directly to support him. The Duke d'Aguillon rode up in full gallop with Marbois's dragons, and joined M. de Bruc's detachment, the van of which had reached the eminences of St. Cae. He immediately ordered the dragons to dismount, the ground being unfit for their service on horseback. It was now about nine in the morning. The enemy's fleet was drawn up in a line, and the boats had begun to embark the troops, which were drawn up in a line of battle upon the shore, in the bottom of the Bay of St. Cae, behind the Downs, and benches which they had made to cover their embarkation. Our troops arrived with incredible speed, and placed themselves upon the eminences of St. Cae. As soon as the enemy perceived them, they began to fire upon them with cannon and bombs from four or five frigates, and as many bomb-ketches that were very near the shore. Our cannon came up, and began to fire about ten. The Duke d'Aguillon settled the plan of his attack in an instant. He posted upon the right of the shore the Count de Balleroy, with the regiments des Vieux, Bousbont, Brisac, and Quercy, to go along the side of the hedges and a bank of sand, which led to the left of the enemy's encroachments. M. d'Aubigny, with the regiments of Boulonnois and Brie, the battalions of Fontenay le Comte and Marmande, and the first battalion of Volontaires Etrangers, was posted on the left, to come down upon the right below the hamlet of Mes; and M. de Bruc had orders to march with his detachment straight up to the enemy's center. The second battalion of Panthiere, with the third battalion of Volontaires Etrangers, under the command of the Chevalier de St. Pern, were posted in reserve. The Chevalier de Remond, quartermaster-general, led the column of the left. The Chevalier

A. D. 1758. Consideration thought it his own private interest, from various views and motives, to co-operate more notoriously

or

de Fontenay, lieutenant-governor-general, was placed in the center, and M^r. de Rouquet, major of the regiment of Royal de Vaisseaux, acting as major-general, commanded the right. During these dispositions, which were executed with uncommon ardour and diligence by the troops, the fire of the enemy's frigates and ketches continued with great violence. The column of the left fell down upon them first, about half past 11 o'clock, with great speed, and was soon followed by those of the center and right. The troops marched up to the enemy's trenches with uncommon spirit, notwithstanding the prodigious fire from the fleet, both of cannon and bombs, and also of small arms from the frigates, and of several armed boats which covered their flanks. The enemy at first advanced, to form a column from their center; but the fire of some pieces of cannon, which M^r. de Villemanor, who commanded our artillery, carried to the right, soon put them in confusion, and made them retreat. The engagement then became general, and lasted an hour and a half. The enemy were forced to give way, and our artillery killed a great number of their men, as they were rushing upon us in confusion. Three of their boats full of soldiers were sunk; many more were killed in boats that reached the fleet. The firing ceased about two in the afternoon, when the enemy's frigates and ketches began to stand off from the land. About 1500 of them were left on the shore, among whom were several officers of distinction, and, in particular, a colonel and lieutenant-colonel of the English guards, besides those that were killed in the boats or drowned. General Drury is among the number of the latter. We have taken upwards of 600 men, and 39 officers, some of whom are of the first families in England, three or four colonels, many lieutenant-colonels, and four captains of ships, that remained on shore to direct the embarkation. This body of troops is totally destroyed. We are informed by the enemy themselves, that of 12 companies of grenadiers, some consisting

on the 15th of the month, and finding and despoiling
the ships of the fleet, as might be easily explained, to the means of capacity. General Buge was imposed on his Majesty for some time. The advocates for a continental war made their use of it: and the opposition to the patriot minister raised the most invidious arguments against a littoral war with our natural enemy. In no words it gave pleasure to many base, envious, jealous, little minds. But no argument can weigh so much in the balance of reason, as that which we are to draw from the behaviour of the French after their deliverance from those brave invaders of their coast.
The more expressive their joy on such an occasion,
the greater must be their sense of the importance of their deliverance. Their churches resounded with Te Deums, and their priests became the trumpeters
of the court to encourage and prevail with them to be always ready to defend their coast against the invader. Their ships were repaired, and their armies of 100 men, others of 20, 30, 40, 50, 60, 70, 80, 90, 100 one got back to their ships. Their whole loss may amount to about 1000 men. Ours amounts to about 400 killed or wounded; but that of the officers is much greater in proportion than of the soldiers. The regiment of Buge and Buge's is half suffered, having been obliged to march over a very difficult ground, under the fire of the enemy's frigates, to get to their trenches. Notwithstanding this obstacle, these regiments marched with the most undaunted intrepidity, as did also all the companies of grenadiers and pickets, which have also lost a great many men. Never did troops discover more valour and intrepidity they advanced with incredible diligence, notwithstanding the fatigue of double marches which they had made to get up, the great part having marched near fifty leagues in four days.

A. D.
1758.

the like attempt, by explaining to them the certain ruin of their trade, their navigation, their religion, and the disgrace of their King and country, should the English ever be able to carry the plan of these operations against their coasts into execution with success. For the best judgment of the importance of a measure is not to be formed upon its success in the execution, but upon the annoyance, and degree of danger, it is capable of bringing upon an enemy in their own opinion. And whatever might be the errors of conduct in the commanders of this expedition, the propriety of the measure is confirmed by the attention it drew from the French ministry: nor can the defeat be exaggerated beyond a skirmish with a rear guard: in which Colonel (Griffin) deserves much greater praise than the Duke d'Aguillon.

Spirits of the English kept up.

How strong soever the attempt of some was, to put the people out of humour with the minister that had advised this expedition; their spirits were kept up, and they were so elated by the success of that glorious national plan, for ruining the French power and interest in North America, which began to operate powerfully in the advices received from thence, during these littoral operations; that, in general, this check, at St. Cas, was looked upon no more than an accidental rub in the way of arms: to which the best concerted measures, and the most able and brave, are liable in the course of a war.

Expedition
against Louis-
bourg.

You have read that North America was the principal object of the minister's care, after providing viding for domestic security; and that he not only meditated the conquest of Cape Breton and its dependencies, and formed a plan to drive the French out of North America, but had taken such precautions, as to insure success to the naval and military forces appointed for these services.

The Honourable Edward Boscawen, Admiral of his Majesty's blue Squadron, sailed the 19th of February, from England, as commander in chief of all his Majesty's ships and vessels employed, and to be employed, in North America, and had under him Sir Charles Hardy, Knight, Real Admiral of the white; and Philip Durell, Esq; commodore: and the fleet consisted of,

The fleet employed.

Ships.		Commanders.
The Name		The Name
	90	Hon. Edw. Boscawen
		Captain Buckle
Royal William	80	Sir Charles Hardy, Kt.
		Captain Evans
Princess Amelia	80	Philip Durell, Esq.
		Captain Bray
Dublin	74	Capt. Rodney
Terrible	74	Collins
Northumberland	70	Re. Hon. Lord Colvil
Vanguard	70	Capt. Swanton
Oxford	70	Spy
Burford	70	Gambier
Somerset	70	Hughes
Lancaster	70	Hon. G. Edgecombe
Devonshire	66	Capt. Gordon
Bedford	64	Fowke

* See page 52, 53. Vol. III.

The

A.D. 1758. The Cape of Good Hope was taken by the British on the 19th of April. The French fleet, consisting of 11 ships of the line, 10 frigates, and 10 transports, was destroyed. The British fleet, consisting of 11 ships of the line, 10 frigates, and 10 transports, was victorious. The British army, consisting of 11,936 men, officers included, together with 324 men of the train, under the command of Major-General Jeffery Amherst, commander in chief of his Majesty's forces to be employed in the island of Cape Breton, &c. — Brigadier-General Edward Whitmore — Brigadier-General Charles Lawrence — Brigadier-General James Wolfe — Colonel Basset, chief engineer — Colonel George Williamson, commander of the train of artillery.

The French fleet, consisting of 11 ships of the line, 10 frigates, and 10 transports, was destroyed. The British fleet, consisting of 11 ships of the line, 10 frigates, and 10 transports, was victorious. The British army, consisting of 11,936 men, officers included, together with 324 men of the train, under the command of Major-General Jeffery Amherst, commander in chief of his Majesty's forces to be employed in the island of Cape Breton, &c. — Brigadier-General Edward Whitmore — Brigadier-General Charles Lawrence — Brigadier-General James Wolfe — Colonel Basset, chief engineer — Colonel George Williamson, commander of the train of artillery.

The army. The British army consisted of 11,936 men, officers included, together with 324 men of the train; under the command of Major-General Jeffery Amherst, commander in chief of his Majesty's forces to be employed in the island of Cape Breton, &c. — Brigadier-General Edward Whitmore — Brigadier-General Charles Lawrence — Brigadier-General James Wolfe — Colonel Basset, chief engineer — Colonel George Williamson, commander of the train of artillery.

Arrive at Halifax. The British fleet arrived safe, without any material accident, in the harbour of Halifax, the capital of Nova Scotia, on the 9th day of May. The Admiral immediately prepared for action; and being joined by all his forces and ships, and they well well provided with water and stores of all sorts, and the sick men recovered for service, he proceeded with 57 sail, transports included, from a harbor of refuge to the seat of action.

Gabarus Bay, about seven miles W. of Eouboung, was the place designed for the landing of the army: where the fleet, with about a third of the troops, came to anchor about five o'clock in the afternoon of the 2d of June; and at six the admiral made a signal for all barges and pinnaces, manned and armed, to attend the General and the Brigadier-Generals Laurence and Wolfe, who went that same evening to reconnoitre the shore as near as possible, and made a disposition for landing in three places, next morning, in case the troops arrived; who made this observation, that every place, where it was probable, or practicable, for our troops to land, was defended by works or batteries, and that the enemy had a chain of posts along shore from Cape Noir to Flat Point, and irregulars from thence to the bottom of the bay. But the troops did not come in till next day.

Several hints were thrown out to the admiral about the impracticability of landing on a shore so strongly fortified and guarded, and concerning the danger of his Majesty's ships riding in a bay, where the pilots had no knowledge of the anchorage. These speeches alarmed the admiral, and put him upon the prudent method of coming at the real sentiments of his officers, by inviting

them

A. D. 1758.

At Gabarus Bay.

Admiral A. D. 1758.

Prudent conduct of the Admiral.

Advised
not to call a council
of war.

8541
A.D.
A.D.
A.D.

Preparations for landing.

How do best

Prevented
by the weather.

GAAD.

1778.

affectedual service. These two were stationed on the left at the little bay in the north east, to which was given the name of Kennington Cove: the Sutherland and Squirrel on the right, near White Point, and the Grammont, Diana and Shannon cruised in the center. A disposition made by the admiral's direction to terrify and amuse the enemy's fortified camps, and to cover the boats employed to land the soldiers.

On the 6th, the wind blew and a thick fog, the admiral made the signal for landing, but before the boats were manned, the wind rising and a great sea running, the defence was put off till the 8th, when the wind being favourable and the weather clear (and commodore Durell having reported that it was his opinion the troops might land on the left, without any great interruption from that morning's surf), the troops were debarked in the boats belonging to the men of war and transports, the former under the direction of a lieutenant-mate or midshipman, and the latter under the direction of the officers of the troops in each boat, the general having given proper orders to each for landing them in three divisions. The signal for this debarkation was made about two o'clock: and as soon as the boats were prepared to set off, the ships, a most furious cannonading was maintained about half a mile from the Kennington, and the other ships in their respective stations along the shore, until about eight o'clock, when the admiral and the Kennington departed.

effectual

P

Vol. III.

Advised
see to call a council
of war.

How effected.

The first landing was made at Kennington Cove, where the British force consisted of three divisions. The first division, under the command of Brigadier-General Wolfe, which was intended to attempt a landing on the left of Kennington Cove, consisted of 550 light infantry, commanded by Major Scott, and four of the oldest companies of grenadiers; the companies of Rangers, supported by the Highland regiment, and those by the eight remaining companies of grenadiers. The second, with their ladder boards, landed near White Point under cover of guns lying close to the shore. A third was made by the second division, consisting of the Royal, Lussell's, Monckton's, Boscawen's, and Wood's, or the Reserve, to the right of the first. Our light infantry, Highlanders, and Rangers, the French termed the English Sauvages, perhaps in contradistinction to their own Native Indians, Canadians, &c. the true French savages. These light infantry were composed of 550 volunteers, all regular men from the most remote parts of the world, some in blue, some in green jackets, and drawers, for the easier brushing through the woods, with hair of black bear's skin round their necks, the bodies of their rifles, some staves two whistles, others flocks, and all well known in that part, with hide round their loins, and a full cannon-ball, and a powder horn slung over their shoulders. The Rangers are a body of irregulars, who have more cut-throat savage appearance, which carries in it something of the appearance of the light infantry.

P. 2

THE GENERAL HISTORY OF THE LATE WAR

AD.
1758
1759

wards White Point; under the conduct of Brigadier General Warrington and the third division, commanded by Brigadier General Campbell. In the center, was formed Sir John's Battalion, Colonel Warrington's, and Sir John's Battalion, and the latter three were of making at the first water cover.

The strength of the enemy, and their fortified coasts,

The enemy had expected this plan for some years, which put them upon many devices to prevent, or to make a descent upon the coast of this island very difficult and dangerous to them that would attempt an invasion. For this purpose they had finished a very strong fortification, which was defended by good regulars, irregulars, and native Indians, posted along the shore in all the probable places of landing, situated at proper distances with heavy cannon and mortars of an extraordinary calibre, mounted on very strong perpendicular wooden stocks, driven deep into the ground; besides other cannon mounted on beams erected in the most advantageous situations for attacking an invading army.

of an extraordinary nature.

These fortifications were the most complete of their kind; yet they had an extraordinary addition by an artificial deposit of trees, which being laid very thick together at the distance of twenty yards in some places, and of thirty in others, between the lines and the water edge, sent their branches towards the sea, quite round the cover, and being the impediment to the front line extremely difficult, even a small boat could not pass without them. For the purpose of making this wards White-Point, under the canopy of Birch trees, and the enemy, with incredible fatigue and effort, did endeavour to break through the branches of the trees, which were interwoven with those of another. What still contributed to the strength of this kind of fortification, was the manner of disposing the forest works in front, so that it only appeared at a distance one continued green of little leaftered branches of fir. Very few guns on their lines were distinguishable out of the reach of their missiles,

and the rest were concealed with spruce branches,
until the boats advanced towards the shore, with a resolution in forcing the works.

The
to dis-victory
will be bemiserable

Our boats rowed up to these places of defence with the most undaunted courage. But as they approached in line of battle, the brave adventurers were presently convinced of their mistake, in regard to the appearance of the enemy's strength, and the enemy, too presuming of their own strong entrenchments and fortifications, promised the latent destruction somewhat before the proper time for its due execution. Before our boats could near the shore, a cannon the batteries began to play, and to fire red hot balls, grape and round shot, with great activity, and a continual discharge of small arms showered upon them from the line, which were about fifteen feet above the level of the water.

Resolution
of our men.

23 02 16
-militar-
-militar-

The boats, however, were not deterred, and towards the shore, the boats of the enemy of Kentucky, and the consequence had been, without doubt, to our people, few or any of whom

Left wing
retreats.

At D.
1758

General
Wolfe
Exasperat-
ed.

Land.

could have escaped, had the enemy suffered our men to land quietly upon that narrow beach; for then they must all have laid down their arms, or have been slaughtered upon the shore. But our troops were rather exasperated than encouraged by this unforeseen and masked way of firing, and making all the expedition they were able towards their center, it was determined with united force to defy all opposition and stratagem, and to land wherever there appeared a probability of any degree of success. Fortune favoured the attempt of the brave Lieutenants Hopkins and Browne, with Ensign Grant, and about 100 light infantry, opened an entrance to the shore on the right of the cove, over rocks and steep, which had been deemed inaccessible and impracticable.

Brigadier Wolfe seized the advantage, gave orders for the remainder to improve the present opportunity, and to support their comrades on shore. Their impatience was such, that they cast off all restraint, and with impetuous emulation, the grenadiers, light infantry, Rangers, and Highlanders, strove who should get first on shore, though exposed the whole time, to the furious fire of a battery of three guns, which sometimes raked, and sometimes flanked them; and to the continual discharge of small arms within twenty yards of them. But what was able to stop their fury? One boat was stove in the hurry, and some grenadiers were thereby drowned; and several overboard and broke to pieces. The loss by the fire was to trifling as not to be mentioned, and chiefly amongst amongst the seamen that had the care of the boats. The landing was effected at this place.

Amongst the foremost in this hot service we find Brigadier Wolfe himself, who jumped out of his boat into the surf, which kept them dancing on the water, and exposed to the enemy's fire. His example was followed by all the troops. Brigadier Laurence, with the rest of the brigades, did the same, a little to the left, soon after: and they were supported with all convenient expedition by the remainder of the center from the ships, and by the division of the right wing, which also gained the more amidst a continual discharge of shot and shells from the enemy's lines. The rear was brought up by Major-General Amherst, bearing testimony to the resolution and bravery with which those troops he had to depend upon in his future arduous undertakings had surmounted difficulties and despised dangers.

It was not the strength and stratagem of the enemy they had solely to combat: the boisterous surf, which drove on most parts of the shore at that time, drove a great number of the boats, by which several of the men were so much hurt and bruised, as to be very incapable of helping and taking care of themselves, and some were crushed to pieces between the boats and the rocks. Most that did land were obliged to do it without order and in much confusion, wading through the great swell, and their arms much wetted: then to scramble up such rugged rocks, and almost upright precipices, as had been deemed inaccessible and

ALD. 1754

General Wolfe . . . leaps into the sea, and is followed by the men.

Boats drove.

A.D.
1644

Dangers

surrounding

ed.

The

The

The

The

The

The

The

The

The

The

The

The

The

The

The

The

The

The

The

The

The

The

The

The

The

The

The

The

The

The

The

The

The

The

The

The

The

The

The

The

The

The

The

The

The

The

The

The

The

The

The

The

The

The

The

The

The

in a need of fortification for their defence. The
 The enemy's design and the danger of the
 The rough and rugged nature of the country
 The men under the command of the
 The day. There were not the only
 They were in a position to make a them to make a proper use of their arms and were themselves the whole time exposed to the upon the fury of the enemy's fire, as looking and climbing the rocks. The enemy's fire was exert itself where Englishmen are allowed to against an enemy in a dangerous position. A war would never encounter, which made the
 the observation, that national virtue is to be for in the spirit of the soldiery, and not in the
 the councils of their officers, where a general has frequently deprived the nation of the advantage that might have succeeded by the vigour and brave minority. For, this national spirit of soldiery was never known to flag under the command of such commanders, as dignified themselves on this occasion.

Draw up and attack
 the batteries.

Such an unexpected gaining what had till now been thought an inaccessible move, and landing in the most incredible places, terrified the astonished foe; and our men acquired such an increase of spirit and fortitude, by every difficulty they encountered, that being arrived at a common place
 to which they instantly attacked the next battery to them in flank with so much vigour, it drove
 the enemy from that strong post with great precision: and with one continued effort of
 the

Confronted
the English on shore.

and the other was so to dispose of his troops that he could not be surprised. He then sent a detachment of his troops to the point of the island, and to prevent a surprise. When this was done by detached parties, one of which gained the possession of the shore for several miles, as far as Louisbourg, and found, in different places, abandoned to the enemy, several pieces of cannon, fourteen large wheels, two mortars, one of brass, eight inches, and another of iron, 14 inches diameter, with a shell in it ready to be fired in a furnace for red-hot balls. Several small arms, and a good quantity of provisions and ammunition, tools and stores. The other party encamped in the pursuit of the dispersed enemy was commanded by Wolfe and Laurence, who drove them over rocky hills and boggy morasses, all the way under the protection of the guns of Louisbourg, from whose ramparts, about ten in the morning, our pursuing party was saluted with a discharge of several pieces of cannon, by which we gained an exact distance for encamping with security from the town to invest it, and it did not damage our troops, and the general officers,

did,

did, that very afternoon, mark out a camp on the very spot which they afterwards occupied during the whole siege. The enemy no sooner saw the preparations for a camp to near them, than the governor of Louisbourg ordered the barracks at the grand battery, already dismantled and ruined, to be burnt. He gave the like orders relative to all the out-buildings; and left nothing standing within two miles of the town walls, but the tower at the grand battery, and some chimneys, and gable-ends of wretched hovels.

Such was the incredible service and extraordinary achievements of a day, that must be ever glorious in the annals of this nation, and convince posterity, that no difficulties nor dangers are sufficient to withstand the impetuosity of an English army; and that every thing ought to be tried before a council of war shall venture to pronounce an attempt impracticable. How that might have been, had Admiral Boscawen left the practicability of this service to the resolutions of a council of war, from which he was dissuaded by the advice above-related, is uncertain; but, if we may be allowed to judge from events, there would be very little hopes in trying to deperate an experiment in tactics, had these hazards been foreseen, and duly weighed with the balance of personal safety.

Being in possession of the shore, the next attention devolved upon the measures to be pursued against the famous fortification, that terror of North-America, Louisbourg, the principal object

A.D.
1745
the
the
the

THE GENERAL HISTORY OF

of the expedition, whose garrison consisted of 1,500 regular troops, 100 militia, 100 sailors, and 350 Canadian, who, during the night, found an opportunity to get into the town. In the harbour there lay six ships of the line and five frigates: which, with the difficulties they forelay in the communication with the fleet through the badness of the weather, and the continual rain on the coast, that greatly endangered the navigation of the smaller craft, and in the length of their approaches over very bad marshy grounds, prognosticated a long, tedious, and hazardous siege. However, the commander in chief took every precaution, by securing his camp with redoubts and entrenchments, from any attempt by the Canadians, who might be expected to make a powerful effort to relieve the town, and from the loss of the French ships in the harbour, to secure his communication with the fleet; and with a resolution and conduct becoming one in his circumstances, he was determined and prepared to meet the greatest dangers.

The surf continued so extremely bad, that he could get only some tents ashore. Nor could any thing more be landed for the army, till the 14th, when the remainder of the troops, the light six pounders, and some artillery stores, were carried ashore. Had the enemy, with their superiority of numbers, and other considerable advantages, attacked our little army, in want almost of every thing, and their communication with the fleet precarious, during this interval, they might have greatly

On the 12th, the French thought of failing out of their strong fortifications. Our men were employed in making a communication from the right to the left in the front of the camp,
and in erecting three redoubts on the most advantageous ground in the front also. A French party put on a vigorous countenance, and marched towards our works: but they were soon driven back, with the loss of five killed and forty wounded, by the light artillery. On the 14th the cannonade from the town continued almost all day;
and then the 11th Battery and Impa gave our men
a great

sunk in the harbour's mouth, with most of their crew cut off, to obstruct the passage for our great ships. And as our works advanced, the cannonading from the town and the shipping increased also; and several skirmishes happened daily between parties from the town and our light infantry, but with no success, nor with much advantage on our side. But on the 28th of July the enemy made a sortie, where Brigadier Laurence commanded. They came from Cape Noir and surprised a company of Forbes's grenadiers commanded by Lord Dundonald, posted in a fleck on the right. Major Murray, who commanded three companies of grenadiers, immediately detached one and drove the enemy back, with the assistance of Whitmore's and Brag's, who behaved very well. — In this skirmish Lord Dundonald was killed, Lieutenant Tew was wounded and made prisoner; Captain Bontain, of the engineers, was taken prisoner; one corporal and three men killed; seventeen men wounded, and one lieutenant and eleven men were missing. On the part of the fort, Chevalier de Chauvelin, a captain, was killed; one lieutenant was wounded and taken prisoner; seventeen men were killed, four wounded and made prisoners, besides others wounded and carried into the town, amongst whom was a captain, that died immediately.

A line of 36 guns, in the harbour.
 Of five frigates, supported by 600 men.

The

10 VICTORY IN THE GREAT
THE GREAT BATTLE OF THE 1ST JULY 1759
We had then, some time, we threw stones into the trenches, and the trenches were filled with stones.

On the 23d the columns were used at night,
and the batteries succeeded so well that they set fire to the enemy's barracks, which burnt with great violence. But the admiral, dubious of the time the siege might take, with the present strength
on shore, on the 24th, ordered four hundred seamen to assist in working the batteries, &c. and two hundred miners were added to a corps of one hundred already established; which had the desired effect. From this time the fate of the besieged seemed to be determined; for, on the 25th they had brought all their batteries to bear: and the admiral concerted measures with the general to destroy the Prudent and Bienfaisant in the harbour.
Six hundred sailors were detached from the fleet,
in boats, to perform this service, to take or to destroy those two men of war, whose intention and proceedings were covered by an extraordinary cannonading from our batteries, to keep the enemy's attention fixed altogether to the land-service. The fire never ceased: and the sailors boarded the two ships, burnt the Prudent, which was a ground, and towed off the Bienfaisant to the north-east harbour. In the mean time, the

Of which gallant action Admiral Boscawen sent the following account to Mr. Pitt, dated 28th of July 1759.

"I cannot help mentioning a particular gallant action is the night between the 25th and 26th inst. the boats of the squadron were, in two divisions, detached under the command of Captain [unclear] and [unclear], to destroy the [unclear] in the 1758.

A. D.

muners and workmen went on very well with their approaches to the covered way, under a continued or burn the Prudent of 74 guns, and Bienfaisant of 64, the only remaining French ships in the harbour, in which they succeeded so well, as to burn the former, she being a-ground, and take the latter, and tow her into the north-east harbour, notwithstanding they were exposed to the fire of the cannon, and musquetry of the island battery, Point Rochford, and the town, being favoured with a dark night. Our loss was inconceivable, seven were killed, and nine wounded. I have given the command of the Bienfaisant to Captain Balfour, and the Echo, a frigate, to Captain Laforey."

About noon, by the admiral's order, two boats, a barge and pinnace or cutter from every ship of the fleet, except the Northumberland, an invalid, manned only with their proper crews, and armed with muskets and bayonets, cutlasses, pistols, and pole-axes, each boat under the direction of a lieutenant and mate or midshipman, rendezvoused at the admiral's ship: From thence they were detached, by twos and threes at a time, to join those of Sir Charles Hardy's squadron off the mouth of the harbour. These they were, in the evening, ranged in two divisions, under the command of the two senior masters and commanders in the fleet, the Captains Laforey and Balfour.

In this order they put off from Sir Charles's squadron about twelve o'clock, and by the advantage of the foggy darkness of the night, and the insupportable silence of their people, paddled into the harbour of Louisbourg, unperceived either by the island battery, they were obliged to come very near to, or by the two men of war that rode at anchor at no great distance from them. There was no great probability of their being perceived from any part of the garrison, not only on account of their greater distance, but also of the preconcerted brisk diversion made upon them, from all our batteries, about that time. Besides, the besieged themselves left nobody an opportunity to hear any noise; for, from having in the day-time observed the numerous scaling ladders that were brought into tinued and very smart fire from it, with grape-shot, and all sorts of old iron from the guns of the ramparts.

A.D.
1758.

Every

our trenches, they were under some apprehensions of an escalade, intended on this night, and kept a constant fire with their musquetry from the ramparts, during the whole time, with the design, if possible, to deter the besiegers from that attempt, by shewing them how well they were upon their guard in all the places it could probably be made.

During this seeming security and prudent precaution on both sides, the bold stratagem of the boats, for surprising the two remaining ships in the enemy's harbour, every moment ripened for the execution. After pushing in as far almost as the grand-battery, lest the ships should be too soon alarmed by their oars, they took a sweep from thence towards the part of the harbour, where the gentlemen knew the ships were, who had before very well reconnoitred it—and presently discovered them. Each division of the boats was no sooner within sight and hail of the noble object of their attempt. Captain Laforey's of Le Prudent, and Captain Balfour's of Le Bienfaisant, then while the sentinels on board having hailed them in vain, began to fire on them, each of the commanders ordered his boats to give way along side their respective ships, and to board them immediately, with all the expedition and good order they could observe.

The boats crews, no longer able to contain themselves in silence, after their manner gave loud cheers as they were pulling up along side, and with the most intrepid activity, armed some with muskets, bayonets and cutlasses, others with pistols, cutlasses and pole-axes, followed their brave leaders, and boarded the ships in an instant, with great spirit, on each bow, quarter and gang-way—and after very little resistance from the terrified crews, soon found themselves in possession of two fine ships of the enemy, one of 74, and one of 64 guns, with the loss of very few of the French, and but one mate.

Q.

The

A. D.
1758.

Every thing concurring to discourage any longer resistance or defence; there being no hopes of relief

The besieged were now sufficiently alarmed on all sides, by the noise of the seamen at boarding, the cheers leaving them no room to doubt that it was from English seamen, and the direction of the confused sound of voices, and firing afterwards, soon leading them to suspect the real fact, an attempt upon their ships. The heroic, successful adventurers were employed in securing their prisoners in the ships hold, and concerning the most effectual methods for securing their prizes out of the reach of the enraged enemy; when both the ships and boats received a most furious fire of cannon, mortars and muskets, from all parts whence it could be directed to them, from the island battery at no great distance, from the battery on Point Maurepas a little farther off, and from all the guns of the garrison that could be brought to bear on that part of the harbour.

After endeavouring, in vain, to tow off Le Prudent, they found she was on ground, with several feet water in her hold. There now remained nothing in their power to do, to prevent her being recovered by the enemy, but to set her on fire—which they did with all possible expedition; leaving along side her a large schooner, and her own boats, for her people to escape in to the shore, which was at no great distance from her. On board of this ship they found a deserter from our camp, who was killed in the little battle at our people's taking possession of her, and by that means rescued from the ignominious execution of military justice.

The boats from Le Prudent now joined the others about Le Bienfaisant, and helped to tow her off triumphantly in the midst of a formidable fire from the mortified enemy; which they did with great speed, by the assistance of a little breeze, and what ragged sails, yards and rigging she had left of any service after the constant fire she had so long received from our batteries. When they had thus got her out of the distance and direction of the enemy's guns, they secured her till the next

A. D.
1758.

lief from Europe, nor any further aid from Canada; their ships entirely destroyed; their harbour untenable; their fortifications ruined in many places; divers practicable breaches made, the garrison in no condition to repulse an assault in breach, nor even an escalade; and sensible that every advantage gained by the besiegers was a nearer approach to their ruin, disposed the governor to the humane consideration of putting a stop to the further effusion of Christian blood. For which purpose he wrote to General Amherst, requesting a capitulation upon the same conditions as had been granted to the English at Port Maiton. But the general having been previously informed by Admiral Boscawen, of his intention to send six ships into the harbour next day, to accelerate the operations by land, as the most effectual way to next day, by an hawser, in the north-east harbour, and enjoyed on board her the first joyful moment's leisure of securely congratulating each other on their success and safety in this hazardous enterprise.

The taking of these two ships by our fleet's boats, on this memorable occasion, as it must be a lasting, indelible honour to the vigilance and activity of those who projected, and to the bravery and conduct of those who executed, the bold design, will also be a new, and perhaps a seasonable conviction to the whole world, that, however arduous, however apparently impracticable any purposed naval attempt may be, the English seamen are not to be deterred from it by any prospect of difficulty or danger; but will exert themselves as far as men can do, and at least deserve success, when led on to it by such as are worthy to command them.

And the bold and successful execution of this enterprise, with the preparations made for a general assault, so terrified the garrison, that next day they surrendered.

A. D. 1758. oblige the garrison to surrender prisoners of war, he rejected the French governor's proposal, insisted upon his surrender at discretion, and threatened him with a general assault by Admiral Boscawen, next morning, in case he did not chuse to submit on those terms. M. Drucour could not relish the thoughts of yielding to those arbitrary impositions; and as an officer that had behaved well in his present capacity, thought himself and the brave fellows under his command intitled to some sort of distinction and favour, and to the honours of war; so that he seemed resolved, and did declare, that he would risk a general assault, before he would comply with such severe terms. However, his stomach was brought down by the petitions and representations of the traders and inhabitants of the place, and of the commissary and intendant of the colony; who foresaw immediate and universal ruin, should the enemy be provoked to make a general assault by sea and land. Accordingly the French governor accepted and signed the following capitulation;

Capitulation.

Articles of capitulation between their Excellencies Admiral Boscawen, and Major-General Amherst, and his Excellency the Chevalier Drucour, Governor of the Island of Cape Breton, of Louisbourg, the Island of St. John, and their appurtenances.

I, THE garrison of Louisbourg shall be prisoners of war, and shall be carried to England in the ships of his Britannic Majesty.

II. All

II. All the artillery, ammunition, provisions, as well as the arms of any kind whatsoever, which are at present in the town of Louilbourg, the islands of Cape-Breton and St. John; and their appurtenances, shall be delivered, without the least damage, to such commissaries as shall be appointed to receive them, for the use of his Britannic Majesty.

III. The governor shall give his orders that the troops which are in the island of St. John, and its appurtenances, shall go on board such ship of war as the admiral shall send to receive them.

IV. The gate called Porte Dauphine shall be given up to the troops of his Britannic Majesty to-morrow, at eight o'clock in the morning; and the garrison, including all those that carried arms, drawn up at noon, on the esplanade, where they shall lay down their arms, colours, implements, and ornaments of war. And the garrison shall go on board, in order to be carried to England in a convenient time.

V. The same care shall be taken of the sick and wounded that are in the hospitals, as of those belonging to his Britannic Majesty.

VI. The merchants and their clerks that have not carried arms, shall be sent to France, in such manner as the admiral shall think proper.

Louilbourg, 26 July, 1758.

(Signed) Le Chevalier de DuRoi.

A. D.
1758.
English
take possession.

In consequence of this capitulation, Major Farquhar, with three companies of grenadiers, took possession of the west gate on the 27th in the morning, and Brigadier-General Whitmore was charged with the disarming of the garrison upon the esplanade. He also received the surrender of their colours; and placed proper guards in the several posts, and over the stores, magazines, &c. The conquerors behaved with great humanity towards the prisoners: but to remove from them all temptation of breaking their capitulation, the general ordered all their arms to be carried out of the town.

Loss of the English.

Thus we may observe with surprize, that Louisbourg, and therewith the whole island of Cape Breton, which had been represented so formidable and almost impregnable and impracticable, on former occasions, fell to the arms of a much less force than had been shipped in the foregoing year for the same service, with the insignificant loss of twenty-one commissioned and non-commissioned officers, one hundred and forty-six private men, one gunner, and three matrosses killed; and thirty commissioned and non-commissioned officers, two drummers, three hundred and fifteen private men, one corporal, one gunner, and three matrosses wounded.

Of the
enemy.

The loss of the enemy in killed and wounded was much more considerable, besides 5637, which the garrison consisted of at the surrender, and artillery.

Books 7427 2211 2214 2215 2216 2217 2218 2219 2220 2221 2222 2223 2224 2225 2226 2227 2228 2229 2230 2231 2232 2233 2234 2235 2236 2237 2238 2239 2240 2241 2242 2243 2244 2245 2246 2247 2248 2249 2250 2251 2252 2253 2254 2255 2256 2257 2258 2259 2260 2261 2262 2263 2264 2265 2266 2267 2268 2269 2270 2271 2272 2273 2274 2275 2276 2277 2278 2279 2280 2281 2282 2283 2284 2285 2286 2287 2288 2289 2290 2291 2292 2293 2294 2295 2296 2297 2298 2299 2300 2301 2302 2303 2304 2305 2306 2307 2308 2309 2310 2311 2312 2313 2314 2315 2316 2317 2318 2319 2320 2321 2322 2323 2324 2325 2326 2327 2328 2329 2330 2331 2332 2333 2334 2335 2336 2337 2338 2339 2340 2341 2342 2343 2344 2345 2346 2347 2348 2349 2350 2351 2352 2353 2354 2355 2356 2357 2358 2359 2360 2361 2362 2363 2364 2365 2366 2367 2368 2369 2370 2371 2372 2373 2374 2375 2376 2377 2378 2379 2380 2381 2382 2383 2384 2385 2386 2387 2388 2389 2390 2391 2392 2393 2394 2395 2396 2397 2398 2399 2400 2401 2402 2403 2404 2405 2406 2407 2408 2409 2410 2411 2412 2413 2414 2415 2416 2417 2418 2419 2420 2421 2422 2423 2424 2425 2426 2427 2428 2429 2430 2431 2432 2433 2434 2435 2436 2437 2438 2439 2440 2441 2442 2443 2444 2445 2446 2447 2448 2449 2450 2451 2452 2453 2454 2455 2456 2457 2458 2459 2460 2461 2462 2463 2464 2465 2466 2467 2468 2469 2470 2471 2472 2473 2474 2475 2476 2477 2478 2479 2480 2481 2482 2483 2484 2485 2486 2487 2488 2489 2490 2491 2492 2493 2494 2495 2496 2497 2498 2499 2500 2501 2502 2503 2504 2505 2506 2507 2508 2509 2510 2511 2512 2513 2514 2515 2516 2517 2518 2519 2520 2521 2522 2523 2524 2525 2526 2527 2528 2529 2530 2531 2532 2533 2534 2535 2536 2537 2538 2539 2540 2541 2542 2543 2544 2545 2546 2547 2548 2549 2550 2551 2552 2553 2554 2555 2556 2557 2558 2559 2560 2561 2562 2563 2564 2565 2566 2567 2568 2569 2570 2571 2572 2573 2574 2575 2576 2577 2578 2579 2580 2581 2582 2583 2584 2585 2586 2587 2588 2589 2590 2591 2592 2593 2594 2595 2596 2597 2598 2599 2600 2601 2602 2603 2604 2605 2606 2607 2608 2609 2610 2611 2612 2613 2614 2615 2616 2617 2618 2619 2620 2621 2622 2623 2624 2625 2626 2627 2628 2629 2630 2631 2632 2633 2634 2635 2636 2637 2638 2639 2640 2641 2642 2643 2644 2645 2646 2647 2648 2649 2650 2651 2652 2653 2654 2655 2656 2657 2658 2659 2660 2661 2662 2663 2664 2665 2666 2667 2668 2669 2670 2671 2672 2673 2674 2675 2676 2677 2678 2679 2680 2681 2682 2683 2684 2685 2686 2687 2688 2689 2690 2691 2692 2693 2694 2695 2696 2697 2698 2699 2700 2701 2702 2703 2704 2705 2706 2707 2708 2709 2710 2711 2712 2713 2714 2715 2716 2717 2718 2719 2720 2721 2722 2723 2724 2725 2726 2727 2728 2729 2730 2731 2732 2733 2734 2735 2736 2737 2738 2739 2740 2741 2742 2743 2744 2745 2746 2747 2748 2749 2750 2751 2752 2753 2754 2755 2756 2757 2758 2759 2760 2761 2762 2763 2764 2765 2766 2767 2768 2769 2770 2771 2772 2773 2774 2775 2776 2777 2778 2779 2780 2781 2782 2783 2784 2785 2786 2787 2788 2789 2790 2791 2792 2793 2794 2795 2796 2797 2798 2799 2800 2801 2802 2803 2804 2805 2806 2807 2808 2809 2810 2811 2812 2813 2814 2815 2816 2817 2818 2819 2820 2821 2822 2823 2824 2825 2826 2827 2828 2829 2830 2831 2832 2833 2834 2835 2836 2837 2838 2839 2840 2841 2842 2843 2844 2845 2846 2847 2848 2849 2850 2851 2852 2853 2854 2855 2856 2857 2858 2859 2860 2861 2862 2863 2864 2865 2866 2867 2868 2869 2870 2871 2872 2873 2874 2875 2876 2877 2878 2879 2880 2881 2882 2883 2884 2885 2886 2887 2888 2889 2890 2891 2892 2893 2894 2895 2896 2897 2898 2899 2900 2901 2902 2903 2904 2905 2906 2907 2908 2909 2910 2911 2912 2913 2914 2915 2916 2917 2918 2919 2920 2921 2922 2923 2924 2925 2926 2927 2928 2929 2930 2931 2932 2933 2934 2935 2936 2937 2938 2939 2940 2941 2942 2943 2944 2945 2946 2947 2948 2949 2950 2951 2952 2953 2954 2955 2956 2957 2958 2959 2960 2961 2962 2963 2964 2965 2966 2967 2968 2969 2970 2971 2972 2973 2974 2975 2976 2977 2978 2979 2980 2981 2982 2983 2984 2985 2986 2987 2988 2989 2990 2991 2992 2993 2994 2995 2996 2997 2998 2999 3000 3001 3002 3003 3004 3005 3006 3007 3008 3009 3010 3011 3012 3013 3014 3015 3016 3017 3018 3019 3020 3021 3022 3023 3024 3025 3026 3027 3028 3029 3030 3031 3032 3033 3034 3035 3036 3037 3038 3039 3040 3041 3042 3043 3044 3045 3046 3047 3048 3049 3050 3051 3052 3053 3054 3055 3056 3057 3058 3059 3060 3061 3062 3063 3064 3065 3066 3067 3068 3069 3070 3071 3072 3073 3074 3075 3076 3077 3078 3079 3080 3081 3082 3083 3084 3085 3086 3087 3088 3089 3090 3091 3092 3093 3094 3095 3096 3097 3098 3099 3100 3101 3102 3103 3104 3105 3106 3107 3108 3109 3110 3111 3112 3113 3114 3115 3116 3117 3118 3119 3120 3121 3122 3123 3124 3125 3126 3127 3128 3129 3130 3131 3132 3133 3134 3135 3136 3137 3138 3139 3140 3141 3142 3143 3144 3145 3146 3147 3148 3149 3150 3151 3152 3153 3154 3155 3156 3157 3158 3159 3160 3161 3162 3163 3164 3165 3166 3167 3168 3169 3170 3171 3172 3173 3174 3175 3176 3177 3178 3179 3180 3181 3182 3183 3184 3185 3186 3187 3188 3189 3190 3191 3192 3193 3194 3195 3196 3197 3198 3199 3200 3201 3202 3203 3204 3205 3206 3207 3208 3209 3210 3211 3212 3213 3214 3215 3216 3217 3218 3219 3220 3221 3222 3223 3224 3225 3226 3227 3228 3229 3230 3231 3232 3233 3234 3235 3236 3237 3238 3239 3240 3241 3242 3243 3244 3245 3246 3247 3248 3249 3250 3251 3252 3253 3254 3255 3256 3257 3258 3259 3260 3261 3262 3263 3264 3265 3266 3267 3268 3269 3270 3271 3272 3273 3274 3275 3276 3277 3278 3279 3280 3281 3282 3283 3284 3285 3286 3287 3288 3289 3290 3291 3292 3293 3294 3295 3296 3297 3298 3299 3300 3301 3302 3303 3304 3305 3306 3307 3308 3309 3310 3311 3312 3313 3314 3315 3316 3317 3318 3319 3320 3321 3322 3323 3324 3325 3326 3327 3328 3329 3330 3331 3332 3333 3334 3335 3336 3337 3338 3339 3340 3341 3342 3343 3344 3345 3346 3347 3348 3349 3350 3351 3352 3353 3354 3355 3356 3357 3358 3359 3360 3361 3362 3363 3364 3365 3366 3367 3368 3369 3370 3371 3372 3373 3374 3375 3376 3377 3378 3379 3380 3381 3382 3383 3384 3385 3386 3387 3388 3389 3390 3391 3392 3393 3394 3395 3396 3397 3398 3399 3400 3401 3402 3403 3404 3405 3406 3407 3408 3409 3410 3411 3412 3413 3414 3415 3416 3417 3418 3419 3420 3421 3422 3423 3424 3425 3426 3427 3428 3429 3430 3431 3432 3433 3434 3435 3436 3437 3438 3439 3440 3441 3442 3443 3444 3445 3446 3447 3448 3449 3450 3451 3452 3453 3454 3455 3456 3457 3458 3459 3460 3461 3462 3463 3464 3465 3466 3467 3468 3469 3470 3471 3472 3473 3474 3475 3476 3477 3478 3479 3480 3481 3482 3483 3484 3485 3486 3487 3488 3489 3490 3491 3492 3493 3494 3495 3496 3497 3498 3499 3500 3501 3502 3503 3504 3505 3506 3507 3508 3509 3510 3511 3512 3513 3514 3515 3516 3517 3518 3519 3520 3521 3522 3523 3524 3525 3526 3527 3528 3529 3530 3531 3532 3533 3534 3535 3536 3537 3538 3539 3540 3541 3542 3543 3544 3545 3546 3547 3548 3549 3550 3551 3552 3553 3554 3555 3556 3557 3558 3559 3560 3561 3562 3563 3564 3565 3566 3567 3568 3569 3570 3571 3572 3573 3574 3575 3576 3577 3578 3579 3580 3581 3582 3583 3584 3585 3586 3587 3588 3589 3590 3591 3592 3593 3594 3595 3596 3597 3598 3599 3600 3601 3602 3603 3604 3605 3606 3607 3608 3609 3610 3611 3612 3613 3614 3615 3616 3617 3618 3619 3620 3621 3622 3623 3624 3625 3626 3627 3628 3629 3630 3631 3632 3633 3634 3635 3636 3637 3638 3639 3640 3641 3642 3643 3644 3645 3646 3647 3648 3649 3650 3651 3652 3653 3654 3655 3656 3657 3658 3659 3660 3661 3662 3663 3664 3665 3666 3667 3668 3669 3670 3671 3672 3673 3674 3675 3676 3677 3678 3679 3680 3681 3682 3683 3684 3685 3686 3687 3688 3689 3690 3691 3692 3693 3694 3695 3696 3697 3698 3699 3700 3701 3702 3703 3704 3705 3706 3707 3708 3709 3710 3711 3712 3713 3714 3715 3716 3717 3718 3719 3720 3721 3722 3723 3724 3725 3726 3727 3728 3729 3730 3731 3732 3733 3734 3735 3736 3737 3738 3739 3740 3741 3742 3743 3744 3745 3746 3747 3748 3749 3750 3751 3752 3753 3754 3755 3756 3757 3758 3759 3760 3761 3762 3763 3764 3765 3766 3767 3768 3769 3770 3771 3772 3773 3774 3775 3776 3777 3778 3779 3780 3781 3782 3783 3784 3785 3786 3787 3788 3789 3790 3791 3792 3793 3794 3795 3796 3797 3798 3799 3800 3801 3802 3803 3804 3805 3806 3807 3808 3809 3810 3811 3812 3813 3814 3815 3816 3817 3818 3819 3820 3821 3822 3823 3824 3825 3826 3827 3828 3829 3830 3831 3832 3833 3834 3835 3836 3837 3838 3839 3840 3841 3842 3843 3844 3845 3846 3847 3848 3849 3850 3851 3852 3853 3854 3855 3856 3857 3858 3859 3860 3861 3862 3863 3864 3865 3866 3867 3868 3869 3870 3871 3872 3873 3874 3875 3876 3877 3878 3879 3880 3881 3882 3883 3884 3885 3886 3887 3888 3889 3890 3891 3892 3893 3894 3895 3896 3897 3898 3899 3900 3901 3902 3903 3904 3905 3906 3907 3908 3909 3910 3911 3912 3913 3914 3915 3916 3917 3918 3919 3920 3921 3922 3923 3924 3925 3926 3927 3928 3929 3930 3931 3932 3933 3934 3935 3936 3937 3938 3939 3940 3941 3942 3943 3944 3945 3946 3947 3948 3949 3950 3951 3952 3953 3954 3955 3956 3957 3958 3959 3960 3961 3962 3963 3964 3965 3966 3967 3968 3969 3970 3971 3972 3973 3974 3975 3976 3977 3978 3979 3980 3981 3982 3983 3984 3985 3986 3987 3988 3989 3990 3991 3992 3993 3994 3995 3996 3997 3998 3999 4000 4001 4002 4003 4004 4005 4006 4007 4008 4009 4010 4011 4012 4013 4014 4015 4016 4017 4018 4019 4020 4021 4022 4023 4024 4025 4026 4027 4028 4029 4030 4031 4032 4033 4034 4035 4036 4037 4038 4039 4040 4041 4042 4043 4044 4045 4046 4047 4048 4049 4050 4051 4052 4053 4054 4055 4056 4057 4058 4059 4060 4061 4062 4063 4064 4065 4066 4067 4068 4069 4070 4071 4072 4073 4074 4075 4076 4077 4078 4079 4080 4081 4082 4083 4084 4085 4086 4087 4088 4089 4090 4091 4092 4093 4094 4095 4096 4097 4098 4099 4100 4101 4102 4103 4104 4105 4106 4107 4108 4109 4110 4111 4112 4113 4114 4115 4116 4117 4118 4119 4120 4121 4122 4123 4124 4125 4126 4127 4128 4129 4130 4131 4132 4133 4134 4135 4136 4137 4138 4139 4140 4141 4142 4143 4144 4145 4146 4147 4148 4149 4150 4151 4152 4153 4154 4155 4156 4157 4158 4159 4160 4161 4162 4163 4164 4165 4166 4167 4168 4169 4170 4171 4172 4173 4174 4175 4176 4177 4178 4179 4180 4181 4182 4183 4184 4185 4186 4187 4188 4189 4190 4191 4192 4193 4194 4195 4196 4197 4198 4199 4200 4201 4202 4203 4204 4205 4206 4207 4208 4209 4210 4211 4212 4213 4214 4215 4216 4217 4218 4219 4220 4221 4222 4223 4224 4225 4226 4227 4228 4229 4230 4231 4232 4233 4234 4235 4236 4237 4238 4239 4240 4241 4242 4243 4244 4245 4246 4247 4248 4249 4250 4251 4252 4253 4254 4255 4256 4257 4258 4259 4260 4261 4262 4263 4264 4265 4266 4267 4268 4269 4270 4271 4272 4273 4274 4275 4276 4277 4278 4279 4280 4281 4282 4283 4284 4285 4286 4287 4288 4289 4290 4291 4292 4293 4294 4295 4296 4297 4298 4299 4300 4301 4302 4303 4304 4305 4306 4307 4308 4309 4310 4311 4312 4313 4314 4315 4316 4317 4318 4319 4320 4321 4322 4323 4324 4325 4326 4327 4328 4329 4330 4331 4332 4333 4334 4335 4336 4337 4338 4339 4340 4341 4342 4343 4344 4345 4346 4347 4348 4349 4350 4351 4352 4353 4354 4355 4356 4357 4358 4359 4360 4361 4362 4363 4364 4365 4366 4367 4368 4369 4370 4371 4372 4373 4374 4375 4376 4377 4378 4379 4380 4381 4382 4383 4384 4385 4386 4387 4388 4389 4390 4391 4392 4393 4394 4395 4396 4397 4398 4399 4400 4401 4402 4403 4404 4405 4406 4407 4408 4409 4410 4411 4412 4413 4414 4415 4416 4417 4418 4419 4420 4421 4422 4423 4424 4425 4426 4427 4428 4429 4430 4431 4432 4433 4434 4435 4436 4437 4438 4439 4440 4441 4442 4443 4444 4445 4446 4447 4448 4449 4450 4451 4452 4453 4454 4455 4456 4457 4458 4459 4460 4461 4462 4463 4464 4465 4466 4467 4468 4469 4470 4471 4472 4473 4474 4475 4476 4477 4478 4479 4480 4481 4482 4483 4484 4485 4486 4487 4488 4489 4490 4491 4492 4493 4494 4495 4496 4497 4498 4499 4500 4501 4502 4503 4504 4505 4506 4507 4508 4509 4510 4511 4512 4513 4514 4515 4516 4517 4518 4519 4520 4521 4522 4523 4524 4525 4526 4527 4528 4529 4530 4531 4532 4533 4534 4535 4536 4537 4538 4539 4540 4541 4542 4543 4544 4545 4546 4547 4548 4549 4550 4551 4552 4553 4554 4555 4556 4557 4558 4559 4

THE GENERAL ARTILLERY

826
24 artillery, stores, &c. Nor was this their whole loss: for the island of St. John, in the Gulf of

A. D. 1758.

An account of the guns, mortars, shot, shells, &c. found in the town of Louisbourg, (errors excepted).

																																																																																																																																																																																																																																																																																																																																																																																																																																																																																																																																																																																																																																																																																																																																																																																																																																																																																																																																																																																																																																																																																																																																																																																																																																																																																																																																																																																																																					</
--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	----

State of the garrison of Louisbourg, July 16, 1758, when it capitulated.

Names of regiments.		Officers.	for duty.	Golden Age.	Wounded.	Others.
Twenty-four companies of the usual garrison, and two of the artillery		70	746	195	1017
Second battalion of Volontaires
Etrangers		38	402	86	526
Second battalion of Cambise		38	466	104	608
Second battalion of Artois		37	407	27	466
Second battalion of Bourgogne		30	353	37	447
Total of the garrison		224	3374	443	3987
Sea officers, private men and marines fit for duty, with the sick and wounded, belonging to the ships		135	1124	1347	2606
					Total prisoners 5637

A.D.
1758.St. John's
surrender.

St. Laurence, and which in some measure supplied Quebec with corn and black cattle; with which produce this island abounded, followed the fate of Cape Breton. Lord Rollo was immediately detached to take possession of it: and the inhabitants, amounting to 4100, submitted to his summons, and brought in their arms. This had been a place of great annoyance to our settlement in Nova Scotia. For, the French neutrals, when driven to distress by the English, found shelter upon this island: and from hence the Indians were encouraged to make sudden irruptions into that colony, and to perpetrate the most inhuman barbarities upon the English subjects; of which Lord Rollo found a most execrable proof in the very palace, or governor's seat, decorated with the scalps of Englishmen, murdered by the savages, hired for that purpose by the French, their patrons and allies.

Expedition under General
Aber-
crombie,
against Crown Point.

This important conquest was made, and the strength of the continent of North America was not weakened, nor the provinces exposed to the surprize and ravagements of the French and their savage allies; as we have seen the case in the reduction of the land army, and the transportation thereof to Halifax, last year; when an attempt upon Louisbourg was resolved by a council of war to be impracticable, without so much as making one ship to land upon the coast of Cape Breton. While this expedition was ordered to proceed upon its own bottom, the forces on the continent were commanded to perform their distinct operations against the enemy by land, to drive them from their encroachments at Crown Point, to open a way for an invasion of Canada, in case they could not be brought to equitable terms of peace, and to recover our losses on the Ohio.

Some farms raised 1200 bushels of corn annually for Quebec market: and Lord Rollo found above 10,000 head of black cattle on this island.

A. D.
1758.

For these purposes we find that Major-General Abercrombie was charged with the chief command and direction of the several operations, and that he himself undertook the expedition against Crown Point with the main body of the army, consisting of 7,000 regulars, and 10,000 provincials; with which he embarked on Lake George, in order to reduce the French forts on that lake, and on Lake Champlain, which he expected would secure the frontier of the British colonies on that side, and open a passage for any future attempts upon the French settlements.

His forces,

Thus intensioned, and enabled to face any army that could be assembled by the French and their allies, Major-General Abercrombie embarked with his whole force on board 900 batteaus, and 135 whale boats, with provision, ammunition, and artillery; besides several pieces of cannon mounted on rafts, to cover their landing, in case of opposition.

Marches
against Ticonderoga.

They sailed on the 5th of July in the morning; in the evening they halted at Sabbath Day Point,

See page 53, Vol. III.

about

A. D.
1758.

about 12 miles from the enemy's advanced guard; landed, and made a great number of fires on the shore, to divide the enemy's attention and forces; and early next morning they arrived at the place where it was proposed to land; and from whence there was a good way leading to, and about five mile off, the French advanced guard. Colonel Bradstreet, with 1500 batteau-men, Major Rogers, with 800 rangers, and Colonel Gage's light infantry, all in whale boats, formed our advanced guard, which was immediately ordered ashore, to reconnoitre the country; which returning with a report, that there was no appearance of an enemy to oppose them, the troops landed with great ease, leisure, and safety. The general formed them in four columns, regulars in the center, and provincials on the flanks; in which order they marched towards the enemy's advanced guard, composed of three battalions of the regiment of Guienne, posted in a logged camp, who fled with such precipitation on the approach of our army, that they had time only to set fire to their tents, and to their baggage, ammunition, and provisions; part of which was saved by the quick advance of the English.

Affirmish.

The army, in the foregoing order, continued their march through the wood on the west side, with a design to invest Ticonderoga, a fort built, about two years before, on the narrow passage of communication between Lake George and Champlain. It had all the advantages that nature and art could give it, being defended on three sides by water,

water, which is surrounded by rocks, and on the half of the fourth side by a swamp, and where that fails, there the French had erected an entrenchment and breast-work about nine feet high. It was in the way to Crown Point, and must be taken by our forces, before they could march thither. It was in this march, that we had the misfortune to lose Lord Howe, of whom General Abercrombie writes to the secretary of state, "That he was deservedly universally beloved and respected throughout the whole army: that his untimely fall occasioned much grief and consternation; and, That he himself felt it most heavily, and lamented him most sincerely." His lordship, at the head of the right center column, supported by the light infantry, being advanced about two miles, fell in with a French party, supposed to consist of about 500 regulars and Indians, who laid in ambush, or rather thought to hide themselves in that thick and almost impassable wood, and had lost themselves in their retreat from the advanced guard. The skirmish was maintained with great resolution, and the enemy did not give way till our flankers had killed 300, and taken 148 prisoners, amongst whom were five officers and three cadets. But, though we lost only two officers, and not above 18 men killed and wounded, our success cost us very dear, in the death of Lord Howe, who fell the first man in this skirmish, by a musket ball through his breast, of which he died instantly. Had our army been sufficiently provided with guides, this

A. D.
1758A

Lord Howe
killed.

Loss of the enemy.

about A
of them
and were all in the

and the first action

At Da
1758.

action might have become fatal to the enemy; by cutting off their retreat; but they being entirely without guides, our forces were deprived of the advantage of taking post on such grounds, as were required for that purpose. The ignorance of the ground was also a great misfortune in the time of action; for it threw all into confusion: wherever any firing was heard, thither all those not engaged immediately hurried, and thereby brought the whole into disorder: so that they could do no more than keep possession of the ground all that night.

Our army
retires.

The impression received throughout the army at the loss of Lord Howe, the great fatigue the soldiers had undergone from the time of their embarkation; the want of provisions, which had been dropt, in order to lighten themselves in their march; and the want of guides to conduct them through the labyrinth of that wilderness, determined the general to return, on the 7th, to the landing place; and they accordingly got thither by eight o'clock in the morning. But at eleven the same day, at noon, Lieutenant-Colonel Brad-

A detachment to secure the saw-mills.

street was detached with the 44th regiment, six companies of the first battalion of Royal Americans, the batteau-men, and a body of Rangers and Provincials, to the amount of about 7000 in all, to take possession of the saw-mills, a post occupied by the enemy, within two miles of Ticonderoga. Bradstreet found that post deserted by the enemy, who had retired, and destroyed the mills, and broke down the bridge: 5 being defended on the side but but he laid a bridge over the river, and was joined that night by the main body of the army, under General Abercrombie, who took up his quarters there that night.

A. D.
1758.

The army
advanced.

Several prisoners were brought into the camp, who agreed in their accounts, that the enemy had eight battalions, some Canadians and colony troops, to the amount of 6000 in all, encamped before their fort: that they were fortifying their camp with strong entrenchments and breast-works; and that they expected hourly to be reinforced by 3000 Canadians, under M. de Levy, recalled from an expedition he had the command of, to make a diversion on the side of the Mohawk river. This intelligence served to accelerate the motions of our army; and the report of M. Clerk, the engineer, who was sent to reconnoitre the strength and situation of the enemy, being in favour of an immediate attack, before the enemy's works could be finished, it was agreed to storm them that very day.

The situation and strength of the enemy.

The Rangers, light infantry, and Provincials, were ordered to march without delay, and to take post in a line, out of cannon-shot of the French entrenchments, so as to extend their right to Lake George, and their left to Lake Champlain, that the regular troops, destined to storm the entrenchments, might form on their rear. The piquets were appointed to begin the attack; they to be sustained by the grenadiers; and these by the battalions. The whole were instructed not to throw away their fire, but to march up briskly, rush

Resolution
to attack
them.

THE GENERAL HISTORY OF

March up
to the enemy.

has now
to depend
the success

Our army
retreated

not only lost the ground

English
defeated,
and retreat

rush upon the enemy's fire, and not to give them till they were within the enemy's breast-work. A brave and well designed disposition. All the forces, except a guard left at the landing-place, to cover and guard the batteaus and whale boats, and a provincial regiment left at the saw-mill, was put in motion, and advanced to Ticonderoga. But, instead of imperfect works, they found the entrenchments much stronger than represented; a breast-work six feet thick, and between eight and nine feet high, and the ground before it covered with felled trees, with their branches pointed outwards: and the ground was filled, for upwards of 100 yards beyond the breast-work, with large logs, stumps, brushwood, &c. over which it was impossible to advance without great deliberation and difficulty. And the enemy, who were entirely under cover of the breast-work, kept an incessant fire from their swivels and small arms, mowing down our officers and brave men by hundreds. Our men, regardless of every disadvantage and danger, like those that would conquer or die, were not insensible of the embarrassment of the trees, that retarded their advancing with intrepidity and bravery; but the general, convinced by the loss sustained, and the impracticability of forcing the entrenchments, that it was no longer prudent to remain before it, judged it necessary, for the preservation of so many brave men, and to prevent a total defeat, to make the best retreat possible. Thus, after several repeated attacks, which lasted above four hours, under the most disadvantageous

fatigues circumstances, and with the loss of 461 regulars killed, 29 missing and 1117 wounded, 87 Provincials killed, eight missing, and 239 wounded, including the officers of both corps, he drew his men off, and retired to the camp he had occupied the night before, with those that were capable of duty, sending off the wounded to the bateaux, which laid about three miles farther; and next morning followed with the whole army to the same place, and embarked for the camp at Lake George.

A. D.
1759.

This defeat and retreat set the busy and observant world to work; who, according to their connections and apprehensions, were very liberal in their censures and apologies. He certainly is to be commended for drawing off his men from an attack, in which they were exposed entirely to the fire of a covered enemy: and he might be deceived, and yet not culpable, in regard to the report of the enemy's strength, and situation of their camp; which certainly was the case, both in regard to the strength of the works, and to their extent. But who can exculpate a general for

Remarks
on this
retreat.

About three o'clock, as the regulars were retreating, one regiment in the center and the troops on the left threw in a very heavy fire, intending to retreat likewise: but the enemy hoisted English colours, and cluded their arms, shewing themselves on their breast-work, and beckoning to our men; on which the whole advanced briskly: but when they were come within fifteen or twenty yards of the enemy, they struck the English colours, and threw in upon them a most terrible fire, such as they had not yet experienced, which killed multitudes, and obliged them to retire.

THE GENERAL HISTORY OF

A. D.
1759.

commanding his men to attack Fort St. Louis without cannon, when he had a sufficient train with him for the service. Who can command his care of himself on such a desperate service, not advancing the whole time farther than the mills, two miles from the seat of action, when his presence was necessary with his army? Who can give a solid reason for his flying, when there was no enemy in a condition to pursue, and re-embarking an army of 14,000 effective men, well provided with all necessaries for support, defence, and to return to the attack of Ticonderoga, with a view of success, by a proper use of the force under his command, against an enemy, that was not above 3000 strong, and from whom both a retreat and succours might have been easily cut off? An officer employed in this expedition writes, "Having secured the advanced posts, after the retreat, the remainder of the army might have kept possession of the mills, a post which is, perhaps, as advantageously situated, and as strongly fortified by nature, as any in the universe. But what was most surprizing, the whole army was ordered to embark, thirty men in each batteau, and to retire to Fort William Henry, after having gained and given up as many advantages in four days, as, perhaps, ever happened, since war has been known. The retreat was so precipitate, that great quantities of intrenching tools, several batteau-loads of provisions and other things were left behind. All strong indications of an unaccountable panic. Yet the Provincial troops were still in good spirits, and the enemy not a match for us in a regular siege. The regulars had sustained a considerable loss: but that loss was not equal to what had been expected on landing, if the enemy had opposed them there. But, continues that officer, "The whole conduct, after Lord Howe's death, was equally madman-like: we were ignorant of the enemy having any breast-works, but that of logs and stumps: we were ordered to storm the trenches, when our field was covered with cannon and stores, and we left the most advantageous ground without being pursued, or having any reason to expect it, and after all, retreated with an army of near 14,000 men from an enemy not above 3000 strong." The fight at the head quarters appears fully from the General's order to the commanding officer at this place, to send to New York all the cannon, wounded men, &c. What our enemies thought of this affair, may be collected from their account in the Paris Gazette.

Colonel

Paris, Sept. 23. Published by authority.

The Marquis of Montcalm being informed that the English had assembled, at the bottom of Lake Sacrament, an army of 20,000 militia, and 6000 regular forces, under the command of General Abercrombie, with a design to make themselves masters of Port Carillon, [Ticonderoga] and to invade Canada, his first step was to take possession of the Falls, on the side of that lake, in order to baffle the efforts of the enemy. He remained in this position till the 6th of July, when a body of the English appeared upon the lake. He then crossed over the river from the Falls, with all his troops, and came to encamp under Port Carillon, where he had already marked out his entrench-

A. D.
1758:
Colonel
Bradstreet's expedition
against Frontenac.

Colonel Bradstreet, by a happy turn of thought, proposed a plan to his commander in chief, after this of suppose you saw that the troops were entrenchments, and sent out different detachments to harass the enemy in their landing.

The Marquis, when he arrived at his camp before Carillon, had only 12,000 French, with 450 of the colony troops.

On the 7th, in the morning, the whole army was employed in throwing up entrenchments, and making barricades of stumps of trees before them. The same day, in the evening, to our great joy, there arrived 400 chosen men, under the command of the Chevalier de Levi. The Marquis committed the defence of the right wing to the Chevalier, that of the left to M. de Bourlamaque, and reserved to himself the command of the center, that he might be the better able to give his orders. The army lay all night upon their arms.

On the 8th, at break of day, the generale was beat, that the troops might know their posts. After this motion, the army returned to work upon the entrenchments. About ten in the morning the enemy's light troops appeared on the other side of the river, and made a great fire, but at such a distance that we continued our work without returning it. About half an hour after twelve their army came down upon us, and all our troops were instantly at their posts with their arms. Our left was first attacked by two columns; the center was at the same time attacked by a third column, and a fourth attacked our right. As the colony troops and the Canadians were not attacked, they came out of their trenches, and took the column in flank that attacked our right, falling upon them with great courage and fury. About five o'clock the column which attacked the center, and that which attacked the right, fell upon the salient angle of the trenches, where our danger became very great; but it was timely assisted, and the enemy met with a resistance that damped their ardour.

About six o'clock, the two columns of the right abandoned their attack, and came to make another attempt towards the salient angle and the center, and afterwards on the left, but they

A. D.
1758.

this retreat, to employ part of the troops, immediately against Cadaraque or Fort Frontenac; and was allowed to carry that expedition into execution with a detachment of 3103 men, consisting of 154 regulars, 2491 provincials, 27 of the royal regiment of artillery, 61 rangers, 300 batteau-men, and 70 Indians. The situation of this fort on the north of the river St. Lawrence, just where it takes its origin from Lake Ontario, was very advantageous, and of great importance to our enemies. It commanded the mouth of the river St. Lawrence, in a great measure, and it was employed as a magazine to supply the forts to the southward. For this reason the government in Old France had stocked this fort with sixty pieces of cannon, and sixteen small mortars: but the

they were every where repulsed. Between six and seven their army made their retreat, favoured by the fire of their light troops, which lasted till night. The darkness of the night, the fatigue of our troops, and the smallness of our number, the strength of the enemy, who were still greatly superior to us, and the nature of the ground, would not permit us to pursue them. We expected them to return to the attack next day, but they had abandoned the Falls and the Carrying-Place, and the Chevalier de Levi, who was sent out to reconnoitre, saw nobody.

We reckon the loss of the enemy, according to the report of the prisoners, to be about 4000 killed and wounded, among whom are several officers of distinction. Lord Howe and Major-General Spittal, are among the slain. Five hundred Indians, who were in the English army, remained behind the whole time, and would not engage in the action. On our side there were 12 officers, and 93 soldiers, killed in the field of battle; and 25 officers, with 248 soldiers, wounded.

A. D.
1758.

fortifications were both inconsiderable and badly contrived. At this juncture it was stored with an immense quantity of provisions and ammunition, for the use of the French forces detached against Brigadier Forbes; for their western garrisons, and the army sent under M. de Levi to the Mohawk river, and with merchandize for their Indian allies.

His success.

Colonel Bradstreet having penetrated to the side of Lake Ontario, he embarked his men in sloops and batteaus provided for that purpose, and landed without opposition within a mile of Fort Frontenac, on the 25th of August. This visit was so little expected, that the garrison, consisting of one hundred and ten men, besides a few women, children and Indians, between seven and eight in the morning, of the 27th, surrendered prisoners of war. By which we became masters of all the contents above-mentioned, and of nine ships, from eight to eighteen guns, which were all the French had upon the lake. Colonel Bradstreet brought two of the ships to Oswego, one richly laden: but he burnt and destroyed the others, together with all the fort, artillery, stores, &c. agreeable to his instructions. Upon which the prisoners did not scruple to say, That their troops to the southward, and their westward garrisons would suffer greatly, if not be entirely starved, for want of the provisions, and vessels, to bring them home from Niagara.

Brigadier Forbes's
expedition
against the Quebec,

The expedition against Fort du Quesne, and the reduction of the Ohio, was committed to Bri-

Valued at 800,000 livres.

gadier

gadier Forbes. His rendezvous was at Philadelphia, from whence he marched with the last division of his forces on the 30th day of June, for the river Ohio. A march pregnant with the greatest difficulties and discouragements, if we consider the length of the way only; but if we take the want of military roads, the howling wildernesses, that were almost impenetrable, the dangerous morasses, and the rugged mountains, into the account, nothing but love, a love for our country, which surmounts and despises all obstacles and opposition, could have animated this army to proceed with an alacrity and courage, that was not to be satisfied with any thing less than victory and conquest.

A. D.
1758.
His difficult march

By a letter from New York, dated July 2d, it appears, that when Brigadier-General Forbes came to Philadelphia, about the middle of April last, he found himself a General without forces, for a considerable time. The greatest part of the provincials, that were to compose his army, were not raised. The Highlanders from South-Carolina did not arrive till about the 7th of June, nor his stores and artillery from England till the 14th of the same month. Besides this, the procuring the large number of waggons necessary for this expedition, where there is no water carriage, occasioned great delays. Yet all these difficulties are at last surmounted, and the General now finds himself at the head of a fine army, in high spirits, the rear of which is by this time advanced upwards of 100 miles on their march. He has likewise a very considerable body of Indians with him, and we have reason to expect all possible success from his known valour, vigilance, and experience. No General was ever more beloved by the men under his command.

A.D.
1758.

His prudent conduct,

The brigadier had a spacious field to display his military talents; in which there had been so many miscarriages; and where the enemy had fastened themselves by every means to improve the natural strength of the country. But the failings of others made him more cautious, more circumspect. He left nothing, or as little as possible, to chance. He, with amazing diligence, secured provisions and carriages; in whose deficiency had been laid the root of Braddock's unfortunate march. He, with a becoming jealousy of his own strength, should he expose it to the lurking invisible enemy, secreted in thick woods, or posted at narrow defiles, expended his scouting parties, who beat the bushes, and ferreted the savage enemy; and he formed new roads, and fortified his camps; without which precautions he must have suffered greatly, as rather have been forced to return with disgrace, by the frequent skirmishes and ambuscades of the enemy's Indian allies, who attempted to cut them off, and did harass them under this most judicious disposition, and cautious march of our army, thro' a prodigious tract of an unknown desert.

In this manner Brigadier Forbes arrived at Ray's town, 90 miles east of Fort du Quesne, where he halted with the main body of the army, and detached 2000 men, under Colonel Fouquet, to L'yal-Henning, with orders to secure that post, and to reconnoitre the fort and outworks of Fort du Quesne. Fouquet obeyed his orders, secured the post, and detached Major Grant, with 800 men only, to reconnoitre the object of their operations, rations, which was at the distance of 40 miles farther. A. D. 1758.

As soon as the enemy saw this party within their power, being informed by their scouts, that it advanced without any support, and that their nearest retreat was to Lyal-Henning, a tract of 40 miles back; a body of troops sufficient to surround them marched out to give them battle, or to cut off their retreat. The English stood their ground with a firmness and bravery worthy of their country. They received the fire of the enemy, and with bayonets fixed, closed and did great execution. But after three hours severe action against great odds, and the number of the enemy increasing, by reinforcements from the garrison, having lost their commander, Major Grant, who was carried prisoner to Fort du Quesne, and about 300 men, including nineteen officers, killed or taken, these brave fellows were thrown into disorder, and obliged to fly back to Lyal-Henning. Reconnoitring party surprised.

Thus one indiscreet motion had well nigh disconcerted all the prudential steps, by which Brigadier Forbes had surmounted the hazards and dangers of a long and almost impracticable march. If Fort du Quesne, and the territory under its dependance, was judged to require the whole force under Brigadier Forbes to reduce it, what could induce Fouquet to detach only 800 men to the distance of forty miles, without any provision to sustain them in case of an attack, in a country of which they were entirely ignorant, and in possession of, and garrisoned by, the enemy? Remarks.

A. D.
1758.

Fort du Quefne
de fette.

Changed to PITTs-BURG.

my? In which circumstances it was morally impossible for that detachment ever to return with any report, should they advance within the power of the enemy; and without a close inspection, their orders could not be executed. But, when the Brigadier was informed of this loss, it served rather to sharpen his resentment and vigour. He suffered no more detachments to be cut off. He marched with his whole army with such expedition, that his sudden and powerful appearance struck the French garrison of Fort du Quelne with a panic: so that they never trusted their safety to the event of a siege, but dismantled the fort, and withdrew, some by boats, others by land, to their forts and settlements on the Mississippi, on the 24th day of November: and, next day, Brigadier Forbes entered and took possession; and having repaired the fort, the contention for which, and the circumjacent lands, had kindled up the present war, and placed in it a garrison of provincials; the troops and officers, emulated by their success, and glorying in the manner who planned their operations in so wise and effectual a manner, unanimously changed the name of the fort, and with a propriety and compliment, which may easily occur to the reader, gave it the name of PITTSBURG. And Brigadier-General Forbes having, by his advantages in several skirmishes, convinced the native Indians, that all their attempts upon his advanced posts, in order to cut off his communication, were vain, and to no purpose, and that it was their interest to accept of a neutral

a neutrality; he found it no very difficult matter to draw them from the French, and even to reconcile them, in a manner, to his Majesty's government: which was the best security of that fine, rich country, against any future attempts to be made by France for its recovery.

Having settled every thing to his desire, and, for the interest of his country, he left a garrison in PITTSBURG, well appointed and provided against any force of the enemy in those quarters; and, for their better content, and for the defence of Pennsylvania, he erected a block-house at Lync-Henning. His intention was to add some other works to Pittsburg; but his health was so much impaired, by the fatigues of this campaign, that he was obliged to hasten back to Philadelphia, where he died soon after, in the 49th year of his age, greatly lamented by all ranks of men, and may justly be acknowledged a public loss to his country.

Brigadier Forbes
returns.

Thus ended the first campaign in North America, under the direction of Mr. BYRNE, which struck so effectually at the root of the French power and interest in the new world, that they never after were able to make any considerable effort to maintain their encroachments, and must have been entirely driven to seek for safety within their provinces of Canada and Louisiana, had General Abercrombie executed his part of the grand operations agreeable to his instructions, and to the strength of the army under his immediate command. How the nation received the news of these Remarks.

these

A. D.
1758.

these advantages, gained by the vigorous measures under the new minister, will be best described by that universal rejoicing throughout this kingdom, and by those voluntary and unanimous addresses to his Majesty on the joyful occasion, from every incorporate and respectable body, led up to the throne by the most dutiful address of the city of London, whose sentiments of the importance of their acquisitions, the wisdom of the ministry, and bravery of the fleets and armies, as they were adopted and confirmed by the rest of their fellow-subjects, will be best conveyed to posterity in their own words, which were thus expressed upon the taking of Louisbourg, &c.

Most Gracious SOVEREIGN,

AMIDST the joyful acclamations of your faithful people, permit us, your Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the Lord Mayor, Aldermen and Commons, of the city of London, in common-council assembled, humbly to congratulate your Majesty on the success of your arms, in the conquest of the important fortress of Louisbourg, the reduction of the island of Cape Breton and St. John, and the blow there given to a considerable part of the French navy.

An event so truly glorious to your Majesty, so important to the colonies, trade and navigation of Great Britain, and so fatal to the commercial views and naval power of France, affords a reasonable prospect of the recovery of all our rights and possessions in America, so unjustly invaded, and in a great measure answers the hopes we formed, when we beheld the French power weakened on the coast of Africa, their ships destroyed in their ports at home, and the terror thereby spread over all their coasts.

in

May these valuable acquisitions, so gloriously obtained, ever continue a part of the British empire, as an effectual check to the perfidy and ambition of a nation, whose repeated insults and usurpations obliged your Majesty to enter into this just and necessary war: and may these instances of the wisdom of your Majesty's councils, of the conduct and resolution of your commanders, and of the intrepidity of your fleets and armies, convince the world of the innate strength and resources of your kingdoms, and dispose your Majesty's enemies to yield to a safe and honourable peace.

In all events, we shall most cheerfully contribute, to the utmost of our power, towards supporting your Majesty in the vigorous prosecution of measures so nobly designed, and so wisely directed.

The attempt upon Goree, on the coast of Africa, had miscarried, as it was apprehended, for want of sufficient strength, after the taking of Senegal. But the necessity there was to reduce that fortress, in order to complete the ruin of the French trade on the coast of Africa, and therewith to put the last and finishing hand to the destruction of those colonies, which our enemies could not cultivate without black slaves; to deprive them of every

A.D. 1758.

Expedition
against Goree.

THE GENERAL HISTORY OF

pass, from whence they might either carry on a clandestine commerce with the Africans, or issue out to distant our navigation on that coast in general, or to Senegal in particular, which could never be safe and undisturbed, while Goree continued in the hands of the French, suggested an immediate effort, this same summer, to drive the enemy from that stronghold.

Goree
island
described.

Goree is a small narrow island near Cape Verde in Africa, W. long. 17. 40. lat. 15. surrounded by rocks, and inaccessible, except at a little creek; a natural and most safe harbour, about 20 fathoms broad and 60 long, situate E. N. E. and inclosed with two points of land; one pretty high, called the Burial ground point; the other much lower, with a sand-bank in front, over which the sea beats with such violence, as to be seen at a great distance. Here is good anchorage for ships; as also round the whole island: and between it and the main land ships may ride safe from the greatest surges. This island has changed masters several times. By the first account it was in the possession of the Dutch, who, in the year 1617, obtained a grant of it from Bram, King of Cape Verde, and fortified it with a castle on a high land, very steep on all sides, which they named Nassau hill, on the north side; and with another fort, called Fort Orange, built in the creek above mentioned, to protect their warehouses. In 1663 it was conquered by the Eng-

* Or Goerie, Dutch, a good road for shipping.

* The sixth part of a league in length.

list, under the command of Commodore Holmes; but was soon after retaken by De Ruyter, the Dutch admiral. In 1677 it fell into the hands of the French, under the command of Count d'Eures, who demolished the forts. But the French East India company, being made sensible of its advantageous situation for the purposes of their trade, obtained a grant thereof from the French King, rebuilt the forts, and continued in possession till this year. It is but small, and till very lately, that M. de St. Jean, director of the island, discovered fresh springs, it was without either wood or water, but what was preserved in cisterns. However, its situation, harbour and good anchoring, like that of St. Helena, render it very considerable for those nations who have settlements on the coast of Africa; or any navigation and trade in those seas. Though it is in the torrid zone, the air is cool and temperate almost the whole year, owing to the equality of days and nights, and alternate breezes from the sea and land. And it is so near the continent, that Cape Verd and the neighbouring promontories may be seen from the north side.

The Squadron ordered for this service consisted of the Prince Edward, the Nassau, the Dumbirby, the Torbay, the Fougueux, and the Emerald and Furnace bombs. — There were also 600 soldiers. Commodore Keppel had the command in chief.

It was the 24th of December before this armament reached the place of their destination. The commodore came to an anchor, with all his ships,

in

A.D.
1758.

in the road of Goree, about three o'clock, the island bearing S. W. by S. about four miles, and in eighteen fathom water. The Saltash was ordered to bear down to a bay between point Goree and point Barnabas, in order to the more speedy and convenient landing of the troops, should there be any occasion for them. But it was the 28th before it was thought convenient to attack the island, when, at four in the morning, all the flat-bottomed boats were sent on board the transports, for disembarking the troops, and all of them were in those boats by nine o'clock. During which time the ships of war also finished their preparations; the signal for weighing anchor having been given at eight o'clock.

The west side was the strongest; but that being the lee side, it was resolved to form the attack on this side, lest the ships cables, being cut by a chain-shot, or any other accident, the ship or ships might put out to sea without any danger, and bearing to windward renew the action; for such an accident on the east side might have brought a ship immediately ashore. Another resolution settled the manner of their going down to the assault. A bomb was ordered to precede, covered by the Prince Edward from the fire of the enemy, and to anchor abreast of a small lunette-battery, la Barbette, a little below the citadel on the north. The eldest captain, Mr. Sayer, in the Namur, was ordered to lead the line of battle on the right, anchoring abreast of St. Peter's battery of five guns: the Dunkirk followed, in order to being up a-bow of a battery to the northward of the former, which battery was not finished, and but an embrasure at that time opened. The commodore in the Torbet, followed him, taking for his post the west point battery of five guns, and the west corner of St. Brancie's Fort, of five smaller guns. Captain Knight, in the Fougues, stationed second on the left, bringing up the rear (firing discharges) at the same time, not over the other bank on his starboard quarter) had allotted to his share the mortar battery, so called from two large mortars, covered by this battery.

III being

A. D.
1754

The moment the first ship had dropt her anchor from the stern, she was ordered to hoist a pendant at her mizen peak, to acquaint the next ship that she had brought up. Which signal was to be repeated by each ship, as she should take her station; and not a gun to be fired till each captain had his ship abreast of his station, and steered both ahead and down. Mr. Keppel concluded these instructions with his good wishes for their success, and desired they would get on board their respective ships as fast as possible, and stand on.

The Prince Edward and Friedrich both bore down about nine to wards the island, and in an instant since the Friedrich began the action, by throwing a shell. Which was returned in a moment by the enemy, from both their first and second. Their second shot carried away the Prince Edward's flag staff, and in the act of an instant, which blowing up, killed a dozen. This drove the Prince Edward into a little confusion, which encouraged the French, who seeing the ship did not return their fire, levelled some of their pieces so well, that several were wounded, and other considerable damage was done, before matters were got to rights. Lieutenant West had one of his hips torn away and bruised in a shocking manner, by an iron bolt driven out of the timber by a ball; and a private sailor, stationed in the fore-top, had his leg shot off. But with a heart like a lion, he let himself down, hand under hand by a rope, saying, as he descended—That he should not have been sorry at the accident, and he intended to stay, but that it gave him pain to think, that he should be considered as being killed already.

A.D.
1758.

The Commodore, who diligently attended to every incident, observing that the French had overcharged her mortars (all her shells falling vastly beyond the island to the south) and (which they on board, in the midst of so much smoke would not discern, he sent his boat on board the Fornace, with orders, "That as they saw the error of the order, in overcharging the mortars, they would avoid that extreme; and that, as the enemy seemed bent upon sinking the Prince Edward and Fire-drake, he desired they would, at the distance they then were, begin their fire, and endeavour, as much as possible, to draw part of the enemy's attention from their suffering friends." The Furnace, pursuant to that order, bore immediately close under the Bourgeois's stern, and began under her larboard quarter, began to fire with good success. The commodore then ordered the Nassau to bear away, on the relief of the Prince Edward, which Captain Sayer endeavoured to do, but he was so unfortunate, that from the enemy's first fire, to the Nassau's taking their attention from the Prince Edward, his ship was wearing almost thirty minutes.

Another advantage to the enemy was the juggling of the wind, which dropt, as the heat of the day came on: so that the commodore's ship, the Torbay, and the Fouguez, which were both running down to the seat of action, were retarded a good deal; especially the Fouguez, which was stopped by the Furnace running athwart his lee-bow, in his course to the Torbay, the commodore having made a signal for his coming on board.

The commodore brought up a breast the angles of both the west point battery and St. Francis's fort, with so much judgment, that when he was aboard, the enemy could not bring a gun from thence to bear upon him. There could nothing reach him with advantage, but two guns from St. Peter's, and three from a small lunette on the hill, in the way to St. Michael's; and their firing was almost silenced by the other ships. So that the Torbay had a battery to attack almost deserted, and with scarce any opposition. — Though indeed, had the enemy been capable to hold an argument with the commodore's ship, the fire from the Torbay was so terrible, so near, and so well aimed, that none but desperadoes or mad men

THE GENERAL HISTORY OF

1791

French soldiers driven from their quarters.

The flag struck.

A parley.

It was impossible for the French soldiers to stand at their quarters. They could not be kept longer against a fire, that was too hot to be withstood. But when the director was informed thereof, the command was, Every man to his quarters, upon pain of death. However, the governor was prevailed upon to strike his flag. The commodore ordered a lieutenant, attended by his secretary, to wait upon the governor on the island, who coming to the beach asked them, before they quitted their boats, On what terms the French Mr. Keppel proposed be bound to surrender, and way of proceeding, after the flag was struck, surprised them: and they asked him then, Have you struck your flag? He answered, No: for we had intended thereby no more than a signal for a parley: and being told, That the commodore insisted on his surrendering at discretion; he replied, I am sufficiently prepared, and know how to defend myself, if the French troops shall not be allowed to march out with the honors of war. The lieutenant having remonstrated the impossibility of a success against the ships, as already moored, and given him the signal of one gun to be fired over the island, by the commodore, for the surrender of the French.

It was impossible for the French soldiers to stand at their quarters. They could not be kept longer against a fire, that was too hot to be withstood. But when the director was informed thereof, the command was, Every man to his quarters, upon pain of death. However, the governor was prevailed upon to strike his flag. The commodore ordered a lieutenant, attended by his secretary, to wait upon the governor on the island, who coming to the beach asked them, before they quitted their boats, On what terms the French

Mr. Keppel proposed be bound to surrender, and way of proceeding, after the flag was struck, surprised them: and they asked him then, Have you struck your flag? He answered, No: for we had intended thereby no more than a signal for a parley: and being told, That the commodore insisted on his surrendering at discretion; he replied, I am sufficiently prepared, and know how to defend myself, if the French troops shall not be allowed to march out with the honors of war. The lieutenant having remonstrated the impossibility of a success against the ships, as already moored, and given him the signal of one gun to be fired over the island, by the commodore, for the surrender of the French.

Mr. Keppel proposed be bound to surrender, and way of proceeding, after the flag was struck, surprised them: and they asked him then, Have you struck your flag? He answered, No: for we had intended thereby no more than a signal for a parley: and being told, That the commodore insisted on his surrendering at discretion; he replied, I am sufficiently prepared, and know how to defend myself, if the French troops shall not be allowed to march out with the honors of war. The lieutenant having remonstrated the impossibility of a success against the ships, as already moored, and given him the signal of one gun to be fired over the island, by the commodore, for the surrender of the French.

Mr. Keppel proposed be bound to surrender, and way of proceeding, after the flag was struck, surprised them: and they asked him then, Have you struck your flag? He answered, No: for we had intended thereby no more than a signal for a parley: and being told, That the commodore insisted on his surrendering at discretion; he replied, I am sufficiently prepared, and know how to defend myself, if the French troops shall not be allowed to march out with the honors of war. The lieutenant having remonstrated the impossibility of a success against the ships, as already moored, and given him the signal of one gun to be fired over the island, by the commodore, for the surrender of the French.

Mr. Keppel proposed be bound to surrender, and way of proceeding, after the flag was struck, surprised them: and they asked him then, Have you struck your flag? He answered, No: for we had intended thereby no more than a signal for a parley: and being told, That the commodore insisted on his surrendering at discretion; he replied, I am sufficiently prepared, and know how to defend myself, if the French troops shall not be allowed to march out with the honors of war. The lieutenant having remonstrated the impossibility of a success against the ships, as already moored, and given him the signal of one gun to be fired over the island, by the commodore, for the surrender of the French.

Mr. Keppel proposed be bound to surrender, and way of proceeding, after the flag was struck, surprised them: and they asked him then, Have you struck your flag? He answered, No: for we had intended thereby no more than a signal for a parley: and being told, That the commodore insisted on his surrendering at discretion; he replied, I am sufficiently prepared, and know how to defend myself, if the French troops shall not be allowed to march out with the honors of war. The lieutenant having remonstrated the impossibility of a success against the ships, as already moored, and given him the signal of one gun to be fired over the island, by the commodore, for the surrender of the French.

Mr. Keppel proposed be bound to surrender, and way of proceeding, after the flag was struck, surprised them: and they asked him then, Have you struck your flag? He answered, No: for we had intended thereby no more than a signal for a parley: and being told, That the commodore insisted on his surrendering at discretion; he replied, I am sufficiently prepared, and know how to defend myself, if the French troops shall not be allowed to march out with the honors of war. The lieutenant having remonstrated the impossibility of a success against the ships, as already moored, and given him the signal of one gun to be fired over the island, by the commodore, for the surrender of the French.

Bound:

Hostilities renewed. The commodore, informed of the Frenchman's behaviour and proposal, ordered a signal gun, as proposed by the lieutenant, to be fired over the island; which was followed by his whole broadside, and some guns from the other ships, that were ready: but before the fire could be renewed in its full vigour, the governor, not being able to maintain his authority over the soldiers, who fled from their quarters, dropt the regimental colours over the walls, as a signal of surrendering at discretion; and the commodore sent a party of marines ashore, who took possession of the island, hoisted British colours on Fort St. Michael, and smothered the ceremony of this conquest, at the foot of the flag-staff, with three bonfires, from the battlements of the citadel.

During the whole time of this attack, Lieutenant Colonel Worge, who had the command of the soldiers, and his troops embarked in San-bartolomew boats, as mentioned above, disposed, and ready at a proper distance, with the intention to attempt a descent, when it should have been found regular and practicable.

The fleet of the island of Goree, at this time, was commanded by Commodore Keppel to the Right Honourable William Pitt, makes the number of soldiers at war 2000, besides the blacks, who were very numerous. Their ordnance consisted of 88 twenty-four pounders, and one brake; 18 sixteen pounders, and one brake; 4 twelve pounders;

The governor surrendered at discretion.

The commodore sent a party of marines ashore, who took possession of the island, hoisted British colours on Fort St. Michael, and smothered the ceremony of this conquest, at the foot of the flag-staff, with three bonfires, from the battlements of the citadel.

During the whole time of this attack, Lieutenant Colonel Worge, who had the command of the soldiers, and his troops embarked in San-bartolomew boats, as mentioned above, disposed, and ready at a proper distance, with the intention to attempt a descent, when it should have been found regular and practicable.

The fleet of the island of Goree, at this time, was commanded by Commodore Keppel to the Right Honourable William Pitt, makes the number of soldiers at war 2000, besides the blacks, who were very numerous. Their ordnance consisted of 88 twenty-four pounders, and one brake; 18 sixteen pounders, and one brake; 4 twelve pounders;

The commodore sent a party of marines ashore, who took possession of the island, hoisted British colours on Fort St. Michael, and smothered the ceremony of this conquest, at the foot of the flag-staff, with three bonfires, from the battlements of the citadel.

During the whole time of this attack, Lieutenant Colonel Worge, who had the command of the soldiers, and his troops embarked in San-bartolomew boats, as mentioned above, disposed, and ready at a proper distance, with the intention to attempt a descent, when it should have been found regular and practicable.

The fleet of the island of Goree, at this time, was commanded by Commodore Keppel to the Right Honourable William Pitt, makes the number of soldiers at war 2000, besides the blacks, who were very numerous. Their ordnance consisted of 88 twenty-four pounders, and one brake; 18 sixteen pounders, and one brake; 4 twelve pounders;

The commodore sent a party of marines ashore, who took possession of the island, hoisted British colours on Fort St. Michael, and smothered the ceremony of this conquest, at the foot of the flag-staff, with three bonfires, from the battlements of the citadel.

A.D. 1758. French re-inforce-
ment from Europe under M. Lally, Block up Port St. David. Two Eng- lish men of war burnt. They burnt their ships, and the men seized to the fort.
 pounders; 5 six pounders; 1 four pounder; 2
 three pounders; 11 swivels; 1 ten inch mortar;
 all iron; 1 twelve pounder; 2 mortars, mounted on beds, thirteen inches; 1 ten inches, all brass; 100 barrels of powder; a great number of shells, filled and empty; a great quantity of shot of different sizes; a great quantity of cannon cartridges filled, and provisions of all species for 400 men for four months.

Affairs of the East Indies. Our arms on the coast of Coromandel were not altogether so prosperous. The French continued in a state of inactivity, after the taking of Chertopur. This appeared somewhat mysterious to our settlements in those parts. But they were directed, from their superiors, to wait and prepare for the arrival of General Lally and a strong squadron, with supplies of men, &c. sent from Old France; without which it would have been impossible for them to act with any view of success against the English, supported by a fleet, in those seas. This squadron consisted of eleven sail, commanded by M. D'Arthe, and appeared off Fort St. David, on the 15th of April, 1758. Two of them proceeded with M. Lally to Pondicherry;
 seven anchored in the road of Fort St. David;
 and two kept to the eastward. By which disposition the French admiral blocked up the Bridgewater and Prison, his Majesty's ships then lying in the road, which were obliged to run ashore,
 to save their crews and stores. These French ships

 2

ships had a considerable body of troops on board ready to land and join a large detachment from Pondicherry, which appeared next morning within the district of Pondicherry, but their junction and the debarkation of the troops was prevented by the Indian and unexpected appearance of the English fleet, the townward, as the French were preparing to land.

ST. GEORGE POCKOCK, Kn^t.

Admiral of the Blue Squadron.

ships had a considerable body of troops on board, ready to land and join a large detachment from Pondicherry, which appeared next morning within the district of Fort St. David; but their junction, and the embarkation of the troops, was prevented by the sudden and unexpected appearance of the English fleet to the southward, as the French were preparing to debark.

ACDA 1798 adT

vft dnm: I

The English fleet, consisting of the French Admiral Pocock, sailed from the Cape of Good Hope, and being informed of the French fleet's road on the 24th of March, with the ships of the line, Weymouth, Cornwall, and Elizabeth, he sailed his flag on board the Yarmouth, David's.

Admiral Pocock
sails in quest of the French
fleet at Fort St.
David's.

On the 17th of April, a fleet of the French fleet, consisting of the French Admiral Pocock, sailed from the Cape of Good Hope, and being informed of the French fleet's road on the 24th of March, with the ships of the line, Weymouth, Cornwall, and Elizabeth, he sailed his flag on board the Yarmouth, David's.

On the 17th of April, a fleet of the French fleet, consisting of the French Admiral Pocock, sailed from the Cape of Good Hope, and being informed of the French fleet's road on the 24th of March, with the ships of the line, Weymouth, Cornwall, and Elizabeth, he sailed his flag on board the Yarmouth, David's.

On the 17th of April, a fleet of the French fleet, consisting of the French Admiral Pocock, sailed from the Cape of Good Hope, and being informed of the French fleet's road on the 24th of March, with the ships of the line, Weymouth, Cornwall, and Elizabeth, he sailed his flag on board the Yarmouth, David's.

His
strength.

On the 17th of April, a fleet of the French fleet, consisting of the French Admiral Pocock, sailed from the Cape of Good Hope, and being informed of the French fleet's road on the 24th of March, with the ships of the line, Weymouth, Cornwall, and Elizabeth, he sailed his flag on board the Yarmouth, David's.

On the 17th of April, a fleet of the French fleet, consisting of the French Admiral Pocock, sailed from the Cape of Good Hope, and being informed of the French fleet's road on the 24th of March, with the ships of the line, Weymouth, Cornwall, and Elizabeth, he sailed his flag on board the Yarmouth, David's.

On the 17th of April, a fleet of the French fleet, consisting of the French Admiral Pocock, sailed from the Cape of Good Hope, and being informed of the French fleet's road on the 24th of March, with the ships of the line, Weymouth, Cornwall, and Elizabeth, he sailed his flag on board the Yarmouth, David's.

On the 17th of April, a fleet of the French fleet, consisting of the French Admiral Pocock, sailed from the Cape of Good Hope, and being informed of the French fleet's road on the 24th of March, with the ships of the line, Weymouth, Cornwall, and Elizabeth, he sailed his flag on board the Yarmouth, David's.

On the 17th of April, a fleet of the French fleet, consisting of the French Admiral Pocock, sailed from the Cape of Good Hope, and being informed of the French fleet's road on the 24th of March, with the ships of the line, Weymouth, Cornwall, and Elizabeth, he sailed his flag on board the Yarmouth, David's.

On the 17th of April, a fleet of the French fleet, consisting of the French Admiral Pocock, sailed from the Cape of Good Hope, and being informed of the French fleet's road on the 24th of March, with the ships of the line, Weymouth, Cornwall, and Elizabeth, he sailed his flag on board the Yarmouth, David's.

On the 17th of April, a fleet of the French fleet, consisting of the French Admiral Pocock, sailed from the Cape of Good Hope, and being informed of the French fleet's road on the 24th of March, with the ships of the line, Weymouth, Cornwall, and Elizabeth, he sailed his flag on board the Yarmouth, David's.

On the 17th of April, a fleet of the French fleet, consisting of the French Admiral Pocock, sailed from the Cape of Good Hope, and being informed of the French fleet's road on the 24th of March, with the ships of the line, Weymouth, Cornwall, and Elizabeth, he sailed his flag on board the Yarmouth, David's.

On the 17th of April, a fleet of the French fleet, consisting of the French Admiral Pocock, sailed from the Cape of Good Hope, and being informed of the French fleet's road on the 24th of March, with the ships of the line, Weymouth, Cornwall, and Elizabeth, he sailed his flag on board the Yarmouth, David's.

Comes in fight.

offing. Admiral Pocock, when on the signal which not being understood, and the French ships standing off shore to the east, he judged that he had been deceived, and accordingly at half past seven, made the signal for a general chase: but before action, they were obliged to shorten sail. The seven French ships being come up with the two in the offing, about noon, formed the line of battle a-head, with the starboard tacks on board, and stood off shore to the westward, with the wind about south. This obliged Admiral Pocock to make the signal for his ships to come to the line a-head, which was repeated by the Queenborough, and every ship got into its station, as fast as possible, within random shot of the enemy, namely little before three o'clock; though some of them were, at that time, four or five miles a-stern.

The enemy's squadron, consisting of eight two-deck ships and a frigate, laid too under their topsails, about two miles to leeward; and their Admiral's ship, the Zodiaque, was particularly distinguished by a cornet at the mizen-top-mast headed. Admiral Pocock bore down upon M. D'Aché, keeping a little a-head of him: and though obliged to receive the fire of several ships by the way, he did not throw out the signal for engaging, till he came within half musket shot of the

The Admiral, by signal, called the Queenborough within shot to him, and ordered, that all her marines should be sent on board the Cumberland, and twenty seamen on board the Zodiaque:

Zachary made a signal for a close engagement, and the ships in the van obeyed, and at half past four he made particular signals to the Cumberland, Newcastle, and Weymouth, to fall up and engage close; because the French rear had drawn up pretty close to their Admiral. But M. D'Aché would not give them time to try their courage; he broke the line, and bore away under the lee of the ships a-head of him; the frigate at the same time fired a broadside at the Yarmouth, and made sail after him. The other French ships made sail up along side of the Yarmouth, in succession to the rear of their line. Our Admiral, at twelve minutes past four, made signals for the Cumberland, Newcastle, and Weymouth, to come up; and at four minutes after, (all the French ships having shot a-head of him, after their Admiral, and the Yarmouth's masts, sails, and rigging, being so much disabled, that she could not keep up with them, after making all the sail possible, the sternmost ships of the enemy then on her bow) he sent Mr. Fenshaw, midshipman, to signify the Admiral's orders for the ships a-stern to make all the sail they

The Admiral's journal specifies, That at seven minutes past three, observing some ships too wide of the enemy, the signal was made for a close engagement, which was complied with by the ships a-head of the Cumberland. — We could not observe that the Newcastle or Weymouth came properly into action with the ships opposite to them the whole time, which gave the French ships a-head of their Admiral an opportunity of lying on the Admiral's quarter, who sometimes had three ships on his at once, and never less than two.

could,

A. D.
1758.

could, and go a-head, and engage the first ships they could come up with. At thirty-three minutes past four all the French Squadron bore away; and at twelve minutes before five our ships a-stern being almost up with the Yarmouth, the Admiral hauled down the signal for the line, and made the signal for all the Squadron to chase the enemy.

Reinforced

About half past five the enemy were joined by two ships about four miles to leeward, hauled their wind, and stood to the westward, with their larboard tacks on board. Our fleet was greatly delayed in their chase by the damage of the Yarmouth, Elizabeth, Tyger, and Salisbury, in their masts, yards, sails, and rigging, which prevented their keeping up with the rest, that had not suffered in the rear. This inability, and the approach of the night, made it advisable for the Admiral to haul close upon a wind, and to make a signal to leave off chase: and he stood to the south-west, to keep to windward of the enemy, that, if possible, he might prevent them weathering him in the night, and renew the engagement in the morning. For this purpose the Queenborough was ordered a-head to watch their motions; and she

Here you have the strength of the French fleet: viz. The Zodiaque and Bien-Aime of 74 guns; the Vengeance and St. Louis of 64 guns; the Duc d'Orleans and the Duc de Bourgogne of 60 guns; the Conde and the Moras of 50 guns; and the Sylphide frigate of 36 guns, all engaged. The two that joined them, after their flight, were the Compte de Provence of 74 guns, and the Diligent of 24 guns, which had landed M. Lally at Pondicherry, worked

worked up after them till six in the morning, on the first day of May; but with so little effect or hopes to come up with them, who had received little or no damage in their rigging, that she left off the chase, and came to anchor about three leagues to the southward of Sadras, where he received information from the governor, that the Bien-Aime, of 74 guns, had been so damaged in the late action, that she was run ashore, and that the rest of the French Squadron was at an anchor a little south of Alamparvey, seven leagues west by north from Sadras.

A. D.
1758.

In this action the French lost 600 men killed, and had many wounded; whereas our loss amounted only to twenty-nine killed and thirty wounded. Because our fire was aimed at the hull; by which the ship and men suffer most. The French fire chiefly at the rigging, by which the men and hull escape destruction.

Their loss.

The French Squadron retreated to Pondicherry: but Admiral Pocock, as soon as he had finished his masts, repaired his most material damages, and taken on board a hundred and twenty recovered men from the hospital, and about eighty Lascars from the governor of Madras, put to sea, and endeavoured all in his power to get up to Fort St. David's, which was then besieged by the French. But that laudable and necessary service was prevented by various accidents, strong westerly winds, and particularly by the current running strong to the northward. So that he was obliged to come to an anchor at Alamparvey on the 26th of May.

Retreat to Pondicherry.
Admiral
Pocock
repairs and sails again.

He

A.D.
1758.

Gett fight
of the French
fleet.

He weighed again, and on the 30th of June appeared off Pondicherry.

On the first of June in the morning the French squadron, consisting of ten sail, weighed and stood out of the road: which carrying the countenance of a resolution to engage him, Admiral Pocock, who had considerably to leeward, prepared to receive them. But they kept close to the wind and plied away from him with so much diligence, that it was not possible to come up with them; but on the contrary, the English lost way by strong currents, want of wind, and the bad sailing of the Cumberland.

The French
march against
Fort St.
David.

The enemy's
strength.

On the 6th of the same month, the admiral received advice from Fort St. George, that Fort St. David had surrendered to the French. For, though M. de Aché was obliged to retreat out of the road on the very day resolved upon to land his troops, to be employed in the attack of Fort St. David by sea and land, the armament from Pondicherry did not retreat. It consisted of 3,500 Europeans: their vanguard, composed of the French horse, 500 of the regiment of Lorrain, and about 200 of the company's troops, a number of Sepoys and artillery men, with eight pieces of cannon, entered the district of Fort St. David, on the 29th of April; they plundered and destroyed all that opposed them, obliged Cuddalore to surrender on the 3d of May, with permission for the garrison to retreat with their arms to Fort St. David. Then they undertook the Siege of Fort St. David. They assembled all their force and began to fire upon it from

from Cuddalore on the 15th, and with five mortars from the New Town on the 17th, on the 20th a battery of seven guns and five mortars was opened at the distance of between eight and nine hundred yards west, another of nine guns and three mortars between seven and eight hundred yards north, and another of four guns to the north east, at about the same distance.

The place was very badly fortified, and much worse defended: no part was bomb proof, so that the shells did great damage and made great slaughter. The Lascars, Sepoys, and most of the officers, were so dispirited by the suddenness of the French motions, that they left the town before the surrender of Cuddalore. The garrison was so much weakened by the desertion of the black forces, that it divided their forces too much to defend the out-posts, which was imprudently attempted; and the European soldiers, having got access to the magazines of arrack and other strong liquors, they were seldom in a condition to do their duty.

As to the fortifications, though there was no breach made, there were thirty guns and carriages dismounted and disabled, and many of the parapets, platforms, and other works, were destroyed by the shot and shells. The tanks or reservoirs of water, except those in the covered way, were rendered unfit for use by the bombardment: and what completed their misfortune, their ammunition, which had been fired away inconsiderately, in many instances, was exhausted before

A. D.
1758.

Attack on Fort St. Louis
David.

The weakness of the place.

Misbehavior of the garrison.

Ammunition wasted.

At D.
1758.

before the enemy began to make their approach, was grown short.

Capitulation
of Fort St. David.

Major Polier, having been truly informed of the untenable state of the place, and lost all hopes of relief from the fleet, requested a council of war: in which it was unanimously agreed to surrender by capitulation, whose principal articles granted the honours of war to the garrison; that they should be exchanged; that they should have leave to carry with them their baggage and other moveable effects belonging to their houses; that care should be taken of the sick and wounded; that commissaries should be appointed and remain to deliver up the magazines, &c. and that deserters should be pardoned, upon condition of returning to their colours.

Enquiry into the conduct
of the commander
in
chief.

The government of Madras was justly alarmed at this loss: and as a much more resolute and obstinate defence had been expected, an enquiry was ordered at Madras to examine into the conduct of the officers, and the causes of the surrender of Fort St. David. This court of enquiry was composed of Lieutenant-Colonel Draper, and the Majors Brereton and Caillaud.

His defence.

Major Polier was much esteemed by the company, and had served them on several occasions with reputation and conduct: but he was too opinionated, suspicious, very hasty and passionate, which often injured the service. He was summoned before this court, and in his defence, urged the weakness of the garrison, the want of ammunition and scarcity of water; the ruinous state of the upper works, and the dismounting of the guns. A.D. 1758.

 But the officers, who composed this court of enquiry, though they commended the personal behaviour of Major Polier, they impeached his judgment for defending the out posts, and thereby Opinion of weakening his garrison, which consisted of no more the court.
 than two hundred Europeans, eighty invalids and about thirty of the artillery; they were of opinion that the town might have held out much longer;
 and that the articles of capitulation were shameful, because the enemy were not masters of the outward covered way; had made no breach, and had a wet ditch to fill up and pass, before the town could be assailed.

M. Lally, who was sent from Europe, to com- Works
 mand in chief for the King of France and the blown up.
 French East India company, ordered the works to be blown up, and reduced the fortifications to a heap of ruins. He extended his power to the wanton destruction of villas, and the fine build- French
 ings in the adjacent country. But the French barbarity.
 afterwards paid dear for this barbarity. The country people, by cutting off supplies for the army, had it in their power to take revenge: and they carried their resentment into such force, that the French were almost exhausted by famine at the siege of Tanjore.

Admiral Pocock, informed of this loss, made Admiral
 the best of his way to Madras: and having there Pocock supplied his Squadron with water and other necess- fails again
 saries, he sailed again on the 25th of July in quest in quest of the French Squadron. On the 26th, coming of the French.

THE GENERAL HISTORY OF

A.D. 1758

to the mouth of the river, and his fleet went to take, sink, or burn, a fleet and seven frigates, chief under the force. The fleet was divided into two squadrons for Pondicherry; the challenge had been sent from Pondicherry with orders, flags, and cannon; but were undelivered. They burnt the frigates, and brought off the boats.

Strength of the English.

The English fleet consisted of no more than seven ships, the same, as were engaged in the last action; but some of them under new commanders.

Strength of the French fleet.

With these the admiral got up, on the 24th in the evening, within three leagues of Pondicherry road, where the French fleet, that consisted of eight ships of the line and a frigate, was at anchor. But M. d'Aché did not seem yet in a temper to fight. He, by ten o'clock the next morning, got under sail; and taking the advantage of the land-breeze, he wronged the English fleet, that waited for him.

Chased by the English.

Admiral Pocock made the signal to chase: but his ships could not get to windward: and, without that, there was no bringing on an engagement. However, having chased them almost to Porto Novo, where he lost sight of them, he, on the 30th, discovered and ran ashore, about two leagues to the north of that port, a ship laden

The admiral, displeased at the behaviour of some of his captains in the engagement, related on page 279 to 281, ordered a court-martial, on his return to Madras, to examine into their conduct. By which court, Captain Nicholas Vissiers was acquitted, and the command of the Weymouth; Captain George Langford of the Mercurius, was cashiered from his office; and George William Armand was sentenced to sit out year's exile as a post captain.

with

with the French, and for the French, and for the English, keeping the east line. The English Admiral Peacock, against the French, fought on the 1st of August, and on the 2nd, the French appeared full in sight. The English, by observing the appearance of the enemy, and trading away time by forming the line of battle, were able to draw on an engagement, for next morning none of them were to be seen. However, 1758.

At D.
Gave fight
of the French.

It may be a matter of curiosity to read the journal of this day, wherein the admiral's judgment, and the enemy's craft will be much better seen.

August the 2d, 1758. Moderate breezes and fair weather; the wind from S. to S. W. At one the enemy was edging down upon us in a line of battle a-breast: the commanding ship, under our three topmasts on the cap, appeared to be close reefed, and steered for our center. At half past one the Cumberland being pretty well up, we made the signal for the line of battle a-head. At two it fell little wind, and came to the southward. About three our line was well formed, and we stood to the eastward under our topmasts; the fore-topmast full, the main-topmast square, the mizen-topmast sometimes full, and sometimes aback, as the ships motions on the line required. At three the signal to speak with the French was given, and soon after for the French to speak with the English. At four the French bearing down on us with the same line, and the English

ADA
175821
23767
RECEIVED
JAN 24 1973
JAN 24 1973

Tyler and 1900s north
Lancaster

Pococke got the weather gage, and forced them to an engagement about one o'clock next day; their line being then in the form of a half moon, the van and rear being to windward of their center.

A. D.
1758.
Forces
them to an engagement.

There being no possibility of getting off without a brush, the enemy's ship in the van fired on the Elizabeth, who was got within musket shot of her. Upon which the admiral threw out the signal of battle, and began the engagement with the whole squadron. D'Aché was now obliged to pull off

Run away;

the mask of bravery, and to run like a coward.

In ten minutes he set his forefail, as did the rest

past seven we stood to the S. E. in a well-formed line, the enemy's van at the same time bearing W. half N. distant about four miles. At half past eight, the enemy's van began to edge down upon us. At forty minutes past eight made the Tyger and Elizabeth signal to change places in the line; and at forty-five minutes past nine the Tyger made the Salisbury signal to close the line; and at ten the enemy bore away, as if they intended to run under the stern of the rear of our line.

At ten minutes after made the signal for the leading ships to steer two points away from the former course. D^d. we edged away, and steered south. At twenty-five minutes past ten made the Weymouth, and the Weymouth made the Newcastle signal to close the line. From this time till twenty minutes past eleven, employed in towing our particular ships into their stations; for there was little or no wind, and the ships in some disorder. At twenty minutes past eleven the sea breeze set in from the S. E. which brought the enemy on our larboard and lee quarter. At half past eleven the enemy's van was on our lee beam, distance about one mile and a half. At noon our squadron was in a very good line, and preparing to bear down on the enemy. The Elizabeth and Queenborough repeated all the signals we made during the action.

T 2

under

A. D.
1758.

under his command, and kept a running fight, in a very irregular line, till two o'clock, when they put before the wind; nor could all that Admiral Pocock was able to do by signals for a closer engagement, prevent their getting away. He then gave the signal to chase: the enemy cut away their boats, and made all the sail they could about N. N. E. and got quite off into Pondicherry road: our fleet being obliged by the night to come to an anchor off Carical, about eight o'clock^{*}.

The

* August the 4th, 1758. Moderate and fair weather. At twenty minutes past twelve P. M. made the leading ships signals to steer six points from the former course; our ships then in a well-formed close line. At fifty-five minutes past twelve made the rear ships signal to close the line. At one took in top-gallant sails. At this time the enemy seemed to be drawn up in a half moon line, their van and rear being to windward of their center. At twenty minutes after one, observing the French admiral made the signal to engage, and their van ships to fire upon the Elizabeth, we immediately made the signal for engaging, which was immediately repeated by the Elizabeth and Queenborough, and obeyed by the whole squadron. Ten minutes after, the French admiral set his foresail, and kept more away. The rest of their squadron did the same, and their line was soon broke. The remainder of the action was a running fight. At thirty-five minutes past one, the signal for the line was shot away, and another instantly hoisted. Two minutes after that, our main-top-sail yard was shot down on the cap, and the main-top-mast much damaged at the same time. Forty minutes past one, the signal for battle was shot away again, and another hoisted directly. At two the enemy's leading ship in the van put before the wind, having cut away her mizen-mast, on account of its being on fire. The French admiral put before the wind eight minutes after, and was followed by all the ships of the enemy, from the van to the center. At

The loss of the French is said to have been very great¹, and their running away seems to confirm that report. As for our loss, it consisted chiefly in our masts and rigging: we had only thirty killed, and sixty wounded, amongst whom was Commodore Stevens, by a musket ball in his shoulder; and Captain Martin, by a splinter in his leg.

ALD.
1758.

Their loss.

Loss of the English.

Two days after this action, the Ruby, a French snow, of 120 tons, laden with shot and medicines, from the islands to Pondicherry, was taken by the Queenborough.

twenty-five minutes past two the enemy's rear put before the wind. At the same time we made the signal for a closer engagement, in order for our ships to bear down, as fast possible, after them. At fifty-five minutes past two, the enemy wore, and hauled up a little on the southward tack, as we did at the same time. At three made the general signal to chase. At the same time hauled down the signal for the line of battle and close engagement; when we made all the sail we could after them, the enemy being at too great a distance to fire at them, and crowding with studding-sails, and every thing else, from us, their boats all cut adrift, and they standing about N. N. W. We were employed in knotting and splicing the old, and reeving new rigging, to enable us to make more sail: the less disabled ships about three miles a-head, and the enemy's rear about five ditto. At six, observing the enemy increased their distances, we made the signal to leave off chase, hauling down the signal for battle at the same time, and, after joining our ships to leeward, hauled close to the wind with the larboard tacks on board; and at eight made the signal, and anchored in nine fathom water, Carical W. half N. distant about three or four miles.

¹ They had above 550 men killed and wounded. Amongst the latter were M. d'Aché and his captain.

THE GENERAL HISTORY OF

However, the French army acted with vigour, and threatened our settlements and our allies on that coast with destruction. The government of Madras, after the loss of Fort St. David, took every measure for defence, as their circumstances would allow. They withdrew the garrisons of Arcot, Chongalaput, and Carangoly, and ordered them into Madras; and sent the like instructions to Davecotah to evacuate the town and retreat, should the enemy march against that place.

Davecotah was the next object of M. Lally's operations, who found it evacuated according to order; the Chief having retired, with the garrison, to Trichinopoly, through the Tanjore country.

Lally having placed a garrison of 700 men in this acquisition, took the route to Trichinopoly, but passed by Tanquebar, where he got a supply of ammunition and field pieces from the Danes: then he proceeded to Negapatam, and formed with the Dutch a contract for a continual supply of provisions, during his intended campaign in the Tanjore country, in case of need. With this assistance the French general marched to Trivalout, a pagoda, fifteen miles from Tanjore; established a magazine, and sent deputies to the King of Tanjore, with a demand of seventy-five lack of rupees, by virtue of a note extorted from him by the French army and the rebel Chunda Saib, in the year 1749; and of a passage through his country, for his army to

It is said, that the Dutch did also supply him with money, cannon, and ammunition.

march

march against Trichinopoly. But the French had commenced hostilities against the Tanjoreans, by seizing upon their port of Nagore, and their route from Nagapattinam, and selling all the effects belonging to the country merchants from all parts of India, found at this port, to the value of five lack of rupees, to one Mr T Fisher, colonel of hussars in their own service for half value, this proceeding, so contrary to common right, and the laws of arms and nations, provoked the Tanjo-reans to take up arms in their own defence; and their King had already ordered Monagrey, his general, to take the field and oppose their march;
 and Captain Caillard, by his instructions from Madras, detached 1100 Sepoys and 500 Colories, to his assistance. But the Tanjorean army could not stand before so powerful a body of European regulars, and retreated with a resolution to maintain a siege in their capital.

Though the King was sensible of his own weakness, and of the strength of the French, the aversion conceived against such a perfidious friend made him reject all proposals of a treaty. However, Modally dropt some of his haughtiness, and, before he would risk every thing to the event of arms, he endeavoured, by an embassy of two officers and a priest, to work upon the King's fears. In this embassy he dropt the demand of the money; he only requested a free passage for his troops; and made a formal demand of the aid of his moony, by virtue of former treaties of alliance between them. The King absolutely re-

A. D.
 1758.
 Rejected.

The Raja assisted by the English.

Another demand of the French

A. D.
1758.

refused to join his troops for their assistance. He consented to a passage for their troops, but not by the road they asked, and he voluntarily agreed to make them a present of two lack and a half of ruppes, more abundant in the country in which he dwelt. The officers returned with this answer, but the priest remained in Tanjore, under the pretence of continuing the treaty, who, encouraged by the concession made by the King, demanded another audience, and then peremptorily demanded a passage, and his troops, and five lack of ruppes. The King, greatly surprized at the priest's presumption, and being informed that the French army kept advancing, contrary to the tenor of all treaties, when a treaty is on foot, he ordered the priest to be dismissed, and the French advanced guard firing upon the town from two pieces of cannon, that same night, there was a final stop to all negotiation.

French
force,

What could not be accomplished by art, was now attempted by force. A train of 14 field pieces, and three of heavy cannon, besides 14 more ready at Trivalour, were placed in a battery before Tanjore, with an army of 1370 regulars, and a great number of disciplined Seapoyns, to form the siege. But the Tanjoreans were spirited up by resentment. They were not discouraged. Frequent sallies cut off some Europeans, and did the French considerable damage; destroyed some convoys of provisions, and greatly interrupted their communication with Carical. On our part, Captain Gaillard had the good conduct and success to prevail.

opposed him to attack with all his force, A. R.
1719. against the French, part of which reinforced the garrison of Trichinopoly, and another part of his troops were employed in harassing the enemy,
and intercepting their supplies.

M. Lally's situation was become desperate. It Desperate condition
of M.
Lally.
was equally as hazardous to retreat, as to remain
before Tanjore: the country being covered with forces, to cut off his retreat, and the want of provisions and other necessaries daily increasing in his camp. In this critical juncture we shall see the Frenchman unmasked. What they can't bring Resumes a negotia-

tion.
about by intrigue and stratagem, nor effect by main force, the French scruple not to attempt by breach of faith, and in open violation of treaty. An officer of some rank and quality, and a priest, were sent to the King, with full powers to accommodate matters, and to remain hostages for the performance of what should be agreed by themselves:

and they so far managed for the French interest,
that the King was prevailed upon to pay 50,000
rupees in hand, and to promise four lack more,
and a supply of 300 horse and 1000 Colliers: on condition that the French army should break up, and remove from before the town. But M. Lally, shewing no dispositions for the performance of his part of the treaty, the King of Tanjore detained the hostages. M. Lally then promised to raise the siege, provided the King would immediately send the reinforcement he had promised;
and that he should detain the hostages till the French army was removed three days march from
the

THE GENERAL HISTORY OF

A.D.
1751.

Breaks his agreement.

the place. But it is certain that M. Lally had no thoughts of leaving Tanjore, and that he was fully bent upon gaining that city, either by force or by any other means. For, he was thus prostituting the sacred faith of treaties, to impose his illegitimate policy upon the Indian. While the hostages were proclaiming nothing but peace and friendship within the walls, Lally was bringing up his heavy cannon, and erecting batteries. So that when the King had ordered 50 of the 300 horsemen, intended by agreement, to march into the French camp, M. Lally, being prepared to batter in breach, pretended that this was a breach of the treaty, and put an end to all negotiation, by ordering those 50 horsemen under confinement, and firing so furiously on the town, that a considerable breach was soon made.

Is attacked.

Such perfidy could not escape its due reward. The Tanjoreans determined to try the fate of a general rally, on the 9th of August. They at once attacked the French camp and batteries, killed about one hundred Europeans, took one gun, one tumbril of ammunition, two elephants and some horse, and blew up four tumbrils of ammunition. The French general, dreading the consequences of such another rally, and having lost most of his ammunition, spiked up his guns upon the batteries, and retreated with all his forces, in the night, to Carical, with such caution, that their flight was not known in the city, till discovered by the returning light of the morning. The Tanjoreans, flurried with success, and spurred fly.

Forced to

spurred with resentment, pursued and took fifty men, two pieces of cannon and two mortars. The rest got into Trivalour, thence to Carical, and, as soon as opportunity served, M. Lally sneaked away with his shattered remains to Pondicherry, where he met M. Soupire, whom he had detached with the troops left at Davecotah.

A. D.
1758.

To Pondicherry.

The Tanjore country being thus delivered from the French, and Captain (now Major) Caillaud at liberty to repair to his order at Madras*, marched from Trichinopoly with two hundred and fifty men, and embarked on board the squadron at Negapatam. They landed at Madras on the 25th of September, and the admiral being obliged, by the approach of the season, to repair to Bombay, he left a captain and lieutenant, with 103 marines, to reinforce the garrison. Many other measures were taken for the security of Madras. Several bodies of auxiliaries were solicited from Iloof Cawn, Morarirow, the King of Tanjore, Tondeman, and the other Polygars in that part of the country. But the French did not make any visible dispositions for the attack of this settlement, till very late in the year, employing their arms in the reduction of Arcot, Tripassore, Conjeveram, and in preparations against the important post^o of Chengalaput, but their designs

The French having abandoned Seringham, Captain Caillaud took possession of that place before he left Trichinopoly.

* It covers all the countries on this side the Pollar; and when in the possession of an enemy, would open a way into our limits, encourage deserters from our garrison, and prevent supplies of fire wood, grain and other provisions for the town.

against

A.D.
1758.

against this place, though they advanced with an army of about 400 Europeans, 500 Seapoys, and five pieces of cannon, were frustrated by placing a garrison of nine companies of Seapoys, twelve gunners, and seventy Europeans; strength sufficient to resist a sudden assault, or a coup de main: and it was not consistent with the French interest to bring up their whole army and heavy artillery before such a place, which might be attended with an expence and loss of time, destructive of their grand object. Thus stood affairs between the English and the French in the East Indies, in the beginning of December, when M. Lally marched against Madras, where we shall leave the belligerents, dealing in the slaughter-house of destruction till the 17th of Feb. 1759.

Expedition
against the French in Golconda.

But we must not yet repass the line. There still remains a scene of blood, and a favourable expedition in Golconda. As M. Lally was invested with a supreme power over his countrymen in these climates, he ordered M. de Buffy and M. Moracin, who were tyrannizing in the country of Golconda, to join him, with part of their forces, in the expedition against Fort St. George; and to leave the command of the other part of the army with the Marquis de Conflans, at Massulipatam. M. Buffy being withdrawn, and the country heartily vexed with the French yoke, the Raja of Visanapore marched with 3000 men to Vizagapatam, imprisoned the French chief, plucked down the French colours, hoisted English colours, and plundered the factory.

M. de

M. de Conflans resolved to punish this insult, by reducing the Raja, and taking Vissanapore, his capital. For which purpose he marched with his army from Massulipatam. The Raja, dissident of his own strength, solicited aid from Calcutta. He informed Colonel Clive of the state of the French forces; of what he had already done; of the universal hatred of the country towards the French; of their desire to come under the protection of the English; and assured him, that a small aid of Europeans would enable him to drive the French quite out of those parts.

The application of the Indian prince was laid before the council by the colonel, after he had weighed every part of the plan with coolness and sound judgment. The council did not receive it with any countenance. They looked upon it to be a hazardous enterprize, and subject to fatal consequences, in case of a miscarriage. But the colonel considered this plan in a more general view. He had often seen an army of French flying before a handful of English, on the coast of Coromandel, and he judged rightly, that such an event, which was more than probable, would greatly contribute to the preservation of Madras. Possessed with these hopes, and animated by experience, the brave colonel, preferring the public good to any private views of advantage, which would arise to himself by a large command, never desisted till he brought the council into his measures to risk something for the security of Madras; and proposed to detach two thirds of his force

A. D.
1758.

The difficulties it met with in council.

Advised and carried by Colonel Clive.

And 1758

Force employed:

Under Colonel
Forde:

forces to proceed M. Condere marching to reinforce M. Lally, who after the reduction of Madras, would have had it greatly in his power also to ruin our interests and settlements in Bengal.

The succours being agreed upon, five hundred Europeans, including a company of artillery, six hundred Seapoys, six four pounders,
and a howitzer, for the field artillery; four twenty-four pounders, four eighteen pounders, one eight inch mortar, and two royal mortars, for a battering train, were detached under the command of Colonel Forde; with the greatest expedition, embarked on the 18th of October, and on the 20th
they arrived at Vizagapatnam; where the Colonel met with Mr. Johnstone, who had been sent to the Raja, with advice of the resolutions taken by the council, and of the sailing of the forces to his assistance. Mr. Johnstone brought him the disagreeable news, That the French were much stronger than had been represented, consisting of about 600 Europeans, between 5 and 6000 Sea-poys, and many country forces, encamped on

At this very time the Shaw Zadah was preparing to march against the Subah, our ally in Bengal, and it was necessary for all our settlements in those parts to send an European force to repulse him. Therefore it should be noted, That had M. Lally succeeded at Madras, the superiority of our fleet would have been no security to Bengal; and our victorious troops at Patna might have experienced a fatal reverse of fortune, by finding themselves cut off from all possibility of a return, it being now by land to Calcutta, from the parts of Golconda, which were possessed by the French, and by sea
from Patna to that settlement.

this

this side Raja-mundry river, at the distance of 100 miles from Vizagapatam, and that the Raja's army did not exceed 2000 men; encamped about thirty miles from the same port. However, Colonel Forde landed his troops, and made the best provision he could in such a country, for their march, and joined the Raja's army on the 3d of the next month.

The united armies marched in quest of the French for some days, when Mr. Andrews, the company's agent and chief at Vizagapatam, together with Captain Callinder, and some other servants of the company, joined the army. They were introduced to the Raja by Colonel Forde, and after paying their address in form, Mr. Andrews remained to see the agreement between the company and the Raja executed. By which the Raja's Raja consented to pay the extra-expence of our army during the time they should act together, allowing the officers double batty, which was to be paid when he should be put in possession of Raja-mundry, a large town and fort, then in possession of the French. And in regard to the conquests that might be made, it was stipulated, That all the inland country, taken from the allies of France, and at present in arms, should be given to the Raja: but that all the conquered sea coast from Vizagapatam to Masulipatam, &c. should remain in the possession of the company.

The enemy was encamped very strongly, with 5000 Europeans, 8000 Sepoys, a great number of Enemies camp and strength, in a country

THE GENERAL HISTORY OF

Our army, which was divided into three parts, the first of which was sent to the village of Rajamundry, and the second to the village of Rajamundry. The third army was sent to the village of Rajamundry. On the 3d of December, and on the 6th, Colonel Forde marched nearer to the enemy's camp, and gained an eminence at about three miles from it. But the French showed no inclination to risk a battle: and it was not prudent to attack them in their present situation. Therefore Colonel Forde proposed a motion of his troops, which would either draw them out of their camp, or get between them and Rajamundry. Accordingly, it was agreed with the Raja, and orders were issued, late at night, for the army to march at half past four in the morning, without beat of drum, or any other noise whatever.

Our army struck their tents, and marched at the hour and in the manner appointed; but the Raja's forces loitered, and were left on the ground, and disconcerted the whole plan. For, M. de Conflans being informed, the night before, by a deserter, that our troops were raw and undisciplined, and that he could guide the enemy to the most convenient place to annoy us, got all his troops under arms at one o'clock in the morning, and detached a large party, under the conduct of the deserter, with six pieces of cannon, to cannonade our camp, which the French, not informed of our march, began a little before day.

The Raja's forces, by this incident, were greatly annoyed, and our men were obliged to return to their assistance, and to bring them off. Which being Answered to draw them out of their entrenchments.

The English march to get round the enemy. M. Conflans's attack of the English camp.

Before dawn, they marched together to Golapool, and encamped on a small plain about three miles from their encampment. But when Conflans found that our army was marched off, and had got a true account of our motions, he soon penetrated into the colonel's intention to steal a march round him, which he must prevent at all events. Therefore Conflans immediately ordered his troops in a line of march towards us, and kept between our army and his own camp. Which orders were so well effected, that in about half an hour after halting, as above, our men discovered the enemy's Seapoys, then the whole line, about three quarters of a mile off on our left flank: and, in a few minutes, all their force closed and moved down towards us, in good order.

A. D.
1756

The order
of battle

The Indians had not yet recovered their fright, and were in some confusion at the sight of the advancing enemy. However, Colonel Forde, to make the best of a bad market, prevailed with the Raja to give up the whole command of his troops to him. And about nine he formed the line, with the Indians, armed with firelocks, on the right and left of the Seapoys in each wing; because the enemy's line extended much further than ours; and with a small body of European deserters, and four pieces of cannon, under Captain Bristol, an European in the Raja's service, together with our artillery, on the left of the battalion.

Colonel Forde's order of battle.

About ten o'clock, the enemy began a cannonade, which was returned, and continued very which began so con-

8 A. D.
1758,

To do

no man

could stand

briskly for forty minutes, on both sides, when the French, mistaking our battalion of Seapoys, dressed in red cloth jackets, for Europeans, their battalion and right wing of Seapoys, with a body of horse, endeavoured to fall upon our left flank. The Seapoys returned their fire pretty smartly, but fell into some confusion, and gave way, as the enemy advanced.

Colonel
Forde attacks.

Colonel Forde, taking the advantage of the enemy's mistake, ordered the European battalion to make a quarter-wheel, as quick as possible; which was done with that expedition, that they made their proper front, were ready to give them their whole fire, as they advanced close, and, after a very great slaughter, advanced with three huzzas, and pushed them, with bayonets fixed, seconded with a smart fire of grape-shot from the cannon, before the enemy had time to recover themselves: which threw them into confusion, and so animated our Seapoys, in the left wing, who had before given way, that they returned to the charge: and they in the right wing behaved with uncommon resolution, and soon made the enemy's black forces, on the left, give ground.

Gains the victory.

So that about eleven o'clock the retreat of the enemy became general. Had the Raja's horse, about five hundred in all, taken the pursuit, scarce a Frenchman would have escaped. But the Raja's troops in general, except the deserters, commanded by Captain Bristol, could not be prevailed upon to advance a foot beyond our European battalion, and had diverted themselves, during the whole action, action, with looking on, and firing a few rockets, and in plundering.

A. D.
1758.

We had forty-four Europeans killed and wounded, including two captains and two lieutenants; the French had 156 killed and wounded, including officers. But great numbers of the black forces fell on both sides.

Loss of men on both sides.

There was a faint appearance of a resolution to rally at their camp: but our troops pursued them so closely, that they dispersed in small bodies, made the best of their way to Raja-mundry, and abandoned their camp, baggage, ammunition, ordnance, tents and equipage; all which fell into our possession; the enemy having saved nothing but four small field-pieces and two camels loaded with money and papers, which their general had sent off to Raja-mundry, as soon as he first perceived the disorder of his army.

Pursued the enemy's camp

Loss of baggage
&c.

Our army halted in the French camp, to refresh themselves, and to bring the wounded in the best carriages they could procure from the field of battle. The French officers made prisoners were permitted to go on their paroles, with our sick and wounded, to Cockanara, a Dutch settlement, about twenty miles from the field of battle.

A detachment of the first battalion of Seapoys was ordered, under Captain Knox, to pursue the enemy that evening, as far as Raja-mundry; and he was, next day, reinforced with two battalions of Seapoys, under Captain Maclean. They being joined, came upon the enemy in the dusk of the evening. The Seapoys threw down their

A.D.

1759

Raja-mundry

dry

the

the

the

the

the

the

the

the

the

the

the

the

the

the

the

the

the

the

the

the

the

the

the

the

the

the

the

the

the

the

the

the

the

the

the

the

the

the

the

the

arms and dispersed: the Europeans took to their boats, of whom fifteen were made prisoners, and some were killed. Captain Knox got possession of the fort of Raja-mundry, and from thence to effectually cannonaded the enemy across the river, until they left the four field-pieces in the boats, on the opposite side.

its consequences

the

the

the

the

the

the

the

the

the

the

the

the

the

the

the

the

the

the

the

the

the

the

the

the

the

the

the

the

the

the

the

the

the

the

Raja-mundry is a barrier and key to the Vizagapatam country. The French held it as their own property, in which they kept a slender garrison and a governor. Our people found here more artillery, ammunition and stores; about 500 bullocks, some horses and camels, and a good deal of rich furniture. The military stores were kept for the company. But Colonel Ford sold every thing else by auction, and divided the produce amongst the soldiers, for their good behaviour.

Plunder

sold by auction for

the

the

the

the

the

the

the

the

the

the

the

the

the

the

the

the

the

the

the

the

the

the

the

the

the

Thus ended the expedition to Golconda, as advised by Colonel Clive, to the great advantage of our affairs in the East Indies, contrary to the opinion of the council at Calcutta.

While our fleets and armies gloriously triumphed over the enemy in Asia, Africa and America, except the loss of Fort St. David, which was more owing to the ruinous condition of its fortifications, neglected by the company, than to any misconduct of our officers, or want of courage in our men, the war in Europe was carried on with extreme vigour, both by sea and land.

It had been concerted to favour the operations in Germany, by a powerful diversion with our naval power, alarming, and if possible, making descents,

War in Germany.

descents, and lodgements of a military force upon the coast of France? Prince Ferdinand had made the best dispositions after the victory at Crœvelt, and the reduction of Dusseldorp, to transfer the seat of war into the enemy's country. But this could not be effected without some means could be found to draw Prince de Soubize's army, out of Germany, or to leave a sufficient strength to cover Hesse and Hanover from his enterprizes, who had already wheeled off towards the Landgrate. However, we shall see presently, that Soubize was too powerful for the Hessian forces; and that the French, though greatly embarrassed by our littoral war, which obliged them to act with more caution and less expedition in Germany, were not driven to the necessity actually to recall their troops from thence; for it is certain, that both Soubize and Conrades had provisional orders, to hold themselves in readiness to return into France, upon the first notice. So far the allies were assisted, and our common interest with Germany was promoted by the expeditions against Cherbourg and St. Maloes.

Under Princerdinand.

This design could not escape the French; and they could not push their arms, or, at least, make a powerful stand and effort towards Hesse and Hanover; they must have felt severely the fatal consequences of Prince Ferdinand's passing the Rhine, and co-operating with our arms on the coast of France. Therefore, their principal effort was to

Since 1713

In 1713

Measures
taken by the French.

at 1713

A.D.
1758.

be made on our weakest part. Instead of enabling M. Contades, with the addition of Prince de Soubize's army, to force the army of the allies, and to drive them back beyond the Rhine, and thereby risking the uncertain chance of a battle, that might expose their own country to certain ruin, the French ministry, whose affairs were now guided by the experienced M. Duke de Belleisle, reinforced the army of M. Contades with draughts from the militia, so as to maintain his ground, but not to come to an engagement; and directed the Prince de Soubize to open a way, at all adventures, into Hesse and Hanover; where the chance of success was greatly in their favour; and where any success must certainly oblige Prince Ferdinand to give up his scheme, of transferring the seat of war into France, and to employ his forces to cover the countries of the British allies.

In Hesse.

Prince Soubize executed his orders with the utmost expedition: and though his vanguard happened to be repulsed by the Hessian militia, he accomplished his purpose by a detachment of 12,000 regulars, under the command of the Duke de Broglie, he himself bringing up the van with 18,000 more, to attack the Hessians, who every where fled before him, and were encamped in an advantageous situation, between Cassel and Munden, near the village of Sanderhausen, to the number of 20,000 regulars and irregulars, under the command of Prince de Ysemburg; which was the whole

strength,

strength, at that time, in the Landgravate of Hesse, capable of making any resistance against an invader. Prince Ysemburg, conscious of his insufficient strength, and willing to gain as much time as possible, in favour of the operations by Prince Ferdinand on the Rhine, would not have waited the arrival of the French army; neither was he inclined to risk a battle, but was resolved to march off. But his troops, especially the militia, flushed with their late success, presumed too much upon their own courage, held the enemy in too great contempt, and refused to stir, without a farther trial of their strength and courage.

Under these circumstances Prince Ysemburg made the best disposition he could, in such a situation. He drew up in order of battle, with his right at a steep declivity or rock, towards the river Fulda; his left reaching to, and covered by a wood, and occupying the summit of the declivity. The advantage of the situation of this little army, on whose fate so much depended, obliged Broglio to take his measures with the greatest precaution. He first secured the defiles at Cassel and Sanderhausen with a guard of 2500 men; and then drew up his army in this form; his infantry in the first line; his horse and dragoons in the second; and ten pieces of cannon, of the brigade of artillery, before his right, to annoy the Hessian troops next the wood. Upon the approach of the French, the Hessian cavalry advanced to attack the enemy's foot. The Duke de Broglio immediately lined a post of his foot, and through

A. D.
1758

Advantages over the Hessians under Pr. Ysemburg.

Battle of Sanderhausen.

1742
1743

no one
and died

1744
1745 1746
1747 1748 1749
1750
1751
1752 1753
1754
1755 1756 1757
1758
1759
1760
1761
1762 1763
1764
1765
1766
1767
1768
1769
1770
1771
1772
1773 1774
1775
1776
1777
1778
1779
1780
1781
1782
1783
1784
1785
1786
1787
1788
1789
1790
1791
1792 1793 1794
1795
1796
1797
1798
1799
1800
1801 1802
1803
1804
1805
1806 1807
1808
1809
1810
1811
1812
1813
1814
1815
1816
1817
1818
1819
1820
1821
1822
1823
1824
1825
1826
1827
1828
1829
1830
1831
1832
1833
1834
1835
1836
1837
1838
1839
1840
1841
1842
1843
1844
1845
1846
1847
1848
1849
1850
1851
1852
1853
1854
1855
1856
1857
1858
1859
1860
1861
1862
1863
1864
1865
1866
1867
1868
1869
1870
1871
1872
1873
1874
1875
1876
1877
1878
1879
1880
1881
1882 1883
1884
1885
1886
1887
1888
1889
1890 1891
1892
1893
1894
1895
1896
1897
1898
1899
1900 1901
1902
1903
1904
1905
1906
1907
1908
1909
1910
1911
1912
1913
1914
1915
1916
1917
1918
1919
1920
1921
1922
1923
1924
1925
1926
1927
1928
1929
1930
1931
1932
1933
1934
1935
1936
1937
1938
1939
1940
1941
1942
1943
1944
1945 1946
1947
1948
1949
1950
1951 1952
1953
1954
1955
1956
1957
1958
1959
1960
1961
1962
1963
1964
1965
1966
1967
1968 1969
1970
1971
1972
1973
1974
1975
1976
1977
1978 1979
1980 1981
1982
1983
1984
1985
1986 1987
1988
1989
1990
1991
1992
1993
1994
1995
1996
1997
1998
1999
2000
2001
2002
2003
2004
2005
2006
2007
2008
2009 2010
2011
2012
2013
2014
2015 2016
2017
2018
2019 2020
2021
2022 2023
2024 2025

Hessians
defeated.

the intervals made by this movement, a part of his force advanced, and charged the Hessian ranks, but they met with so resolute a reception, that they were repulsed, and the infantry were in great danger of being broken; had not the royal Bavarian regiments, saluted them with a volley, that brought most of them to the ground, and so disabled the rest, that they never after appeared in this action. In the mean time, M. de Waldorf, Major-General, and M. Dieback, made a vigorous attack on the wood, with a brigade of Swiss, and three companies of grenadiers; but were severely treated, and obliged to fall back. The infantry of the Hessian right marched briskly up to the fire on the left; the fire was extremely hot on both sides. The Hessians were obliged to retreat about 100 paces; they rallied under a declivity, and returning under its favour, which partly covered them, they in their turn forced the enemy's left to give way, turned them, and endeavoured to get behind them: when the Duke de Broglie, convinced of his own danger, and of the necessity of a vigorous effort to snatch victory out of the hands of the Hessians, he first brought up the Apcher dragoons, and the cavalry behind them, through a very brisk fire; and then he ordered three regiments of grenadiers to march up to the declivity, and to charge the enemy with their bayonets fixed. So that numbers prevailed, and the brave defenders of their country were forced to give way and fly, after an action that lasted full five hours.

U

The

To the Hesse men to the woods on the banks of the Fulda and dispersed, as well as they could. Forty left in the engagement 300 men prisoners, including 50 officers, amongst whom was the Count de Gauritz, the second in command, an aid de camp to Prince Ylimburg, and several lieutenants, colonels, and majors. The number slain and wounded were about 1500, including 300 that perished in the Fulda, endeavouring to swim that river, which they entered from the declivity. They lost seven pieces of cannon on the field of battle, and eight at Munden, which they abandoned. On the part of the French, they had 1785 men killed, and 1992 wounded. The Duke de Broglie, his aid de camp, and master of horse, had each a horse killed under him. This is said to have been the most bloody action with the French during the war.

AND 343 Lost on
both sides.

By this victory the French assumed to themselves the possession of the Weser, and were in a condition to act, not only in Hesse, but in Westphalia and Hanover, as they pleased, which entirely disconcerted Prince Ferdinand's plan of operations, who now had no resource, but either to bring the French to a battle, in hopes of victory, or to repass the Rhine. But he had two great obstacles yet to overcome. He was retarded in the execution of necessary measures by long and

The French account says only 705, but the Hesse account makes the loss of the French in this action above 2000 killed and wounded.

A. D.
1758.

Prince
Ferdinand's reasons for repassing
the Rhine.

Executed
with safety.

heavy rains, that broke up the roads, overflowed the banks of the rivers, and hindered his marching. And again, the French could not be brought to an engagement. So that when he received the news of Prince Ysemburg's defeat, and was informed that the enemy was reinforcing the fortresses of Gueldre, and several other posts, capable of obstructing his convoys, and cutting off the subsistence of his army; and further, that unnecessary delays might furnish Prince de Soubize with an opportunity to intercept the troops he expected at that juncture from England, his Highness resolved to march back over the Rhine.

This resolution was carried into execution on the 8th of July, when the whole army moved nearer the Maese, and encamped between Ruremond and Schwalm, with the head-quarters at Hellenrad. In this march the enemy shewed themselves on our left, and took possession of Bruggen. But Prince Ferdinand detached a party that dislodged them, and made themselves masters of the town. There was no doubt of the enemy's moving towards us; but they so covered their motions by the detachments of light troops, that very imperfect notions only could be formed of their real intention. The Prince supplied the want of intelligence by his own sagacity and penetration, and conducted his army so dexterously, that he fell in with the enemy in his march to Dulcken, in the night between the 1st and 2d of August.

M. Con,

M. Contades, who hitherto had carefully avoided an engagement, and little expecting to meet Prince Ferdinand in his route, retreated to his old camp at Dalem, from whence he had marched, rather than give battle. However, his Highness, not certain of the enemy's resolution, got his army under arms early on the 3d in the morning, and made a motion for advancing towards the enemy. But they, by their motions, soon convinced him of their dislike to fight. They marched off with speed, and it being inconsistent with the present situation of the allies to waste time in the pursuit of an enemy that was determined not to fight, he marched forward to Watchtendonck, an island surrounded by the Niers, not fortified, but of very difficult approach. The Hereditary Prince of Brunswick was ordered to force this post, with the vanguard; and the rear was composed of Prussians, under the Prince of Holstein. The Hereditary Prince found the bridge drawn up at his approach, and to save time in the pursuit of the guard which drew it up, he entered the river. Some companies of grenadiers followed his example; and with bayonets fixed, they drove the enemy away, and secured the bridges, over which the army passed that evening. After this the army marched on the 4th to Rhineberg, without seeing a single troop of the enemy. But in the evening, news was brought that M. de Chevert had passed the Lippe, with twelve or fourteen battalions, and several squadrons, in all 12,000 men, in order to join the garrison of Wesel, and then to fall upon a corps

A. D. 1738.

M. Contades's motions.

A skirmish at Watchtendonck.

M. de Chevert passes the Lippe.

ADDA a corps of about 3000 men, encamped at Meer, under Lieutenant-General Imhoff, who was ordered to guard a bridge Prince Ferdinand had thrown over at Rees.

To attack General Imhoff.

His Highness was convinced of the truth of this intelligence, and expected that Imhoff would be attacked next day; but it was not in his power to reinforce or to support him. His men were too much fatigued to begin another march that same evening, and the overflowing of the Rhine had rendered the bridge at Rees impassable. Therefore M. Imhoff had nothing to trust unto but his own good conduct and the bravery of his troops, which had been six battalions and four squadrons; but were greatly reduced by several detachments made from them.

Agreeable to the intelligence received, (General Imhoff being returned to his advantageous post at Meer, upon a report of the enemy's preparations to attack him) the advanced guards were no sooner posted, but they found themselves engaged with the enemy, who advanced from Wesel, under the command of Lieutenant-General de Chevert, &c. with the whole corps of troops designed to make the siege of Dusseldorp.

His strong camp.

General Imhoff's camp was covered in front by coppices and ditches, with a rising ground on his right; from whence he could see the whole force of the enemy, and pass a sound judgment on the nature of their march. He perceived that the enemy was not acquainted with the ground; and that they would be soon entangled in

in its difficulties. With this expectation he ordered his infantry to advance about 600 paces from the first hedge; he took a regiment from his right, and placed it in the coppice, in order to fall upon the naked left wing of the enemy, which he saw uncovered, and gave orders to the other regiments to march with drums beating, up to the enemy, as soon as they should hear the fire of the regiment posted in the coppice, and to attack them with bayonets fixed. The enemy entered the dangerous ground as expected; and General Imhoff's orders were executed by the whole six battalions, with such impetuosity and effect, that, after a resistance of about half an hour, the enemy was put into confusion; fled towards Wesel, and left on the spot eleven pieces of cannon, and a great many waggons and other carriages, with ammunition; besides 354 prisoners, amongst whom were eleven officers; 150 killed, and 200 wounded: whereas the killed and wounded in General Imhoff's corps did not exceed 200 men.

His Serene Highness waited this event with great impatience; and as soon as informed of this glorious victory, over an enemy triple the number of the conquerors, he detached General Wangenheim, with several squadrons and battalions, to reinforce General Imhoff, and to put him in a posture to receive the French, who were then in the neighbourhood of the French was so great, that they threw down their arms; and some women were gathered from the ground over which they ran away.

condi.

A. D. 1758. condition to make the utmost advantage of a victory as complete as it was glorious to the arms of Great Britain and her allies. The allied army then proceeded with an intention to pass the Rhine at Rhineberg; but that river had been swelled so prodigiously by the continual rains, that the shore was inaccessible both at Rhineberg and at Rees, which obliged them to throw a bridge over at Griethuyfen.

This bridge was laid over between the 8th and the 9th. The enemy, having advice of this expedient, and the detriment it was to the allies to be kept in this bad situation, sent four boats of a particular construction, to destroy it, from Wesel, on the morning of the 9th. But this was not done so secretly, as to escape the knowledge of our commander in chief, who sent the armed vessels he had on the river to intercept them; which they punctually performed. So that the whole army passed that day, and the next, without the least interruption, having withdrawn the garrison from Duffeldorp; which, on the 13th, passed the Rhine, at Wesel. Soon after General Luttrell, reinforced to eleven battalions and ten squadrons, marched to meet the troops arrived from England by the way of Embden, under the Duke of Marlborough, and happily succeeded in their junction at Coesfeldt.

Joins the British troops.

Thus, as the advantage gained by the Duke de Broglie, at Sanderhausen in Hesse, deprived Prince Ferdinand of the good effects he had in view from the battle of Creveld; so the action at Meer, with the

the seasonable reinforcement of British troops, not only facilitated Prince Ferdinand's passage of the Rhine, but prevented any material advantages being drawn from the battle at Sanderhausen.

A. D.
1758.

The allied army being united, their commander, sensible of the fatigues his troops had undergone, by the unwholesomeness of the wet season, and continual service, judiciously chose some excellent posts upon the river Lippe, and there placed himself in a posture of defence, to prevent the enemy's penetrating by that way into Hanover. At the same time he provided for the safety of that Electorate, and the Landgravate of Hesse-Cassel, by placing Prince Ysenberg, with the remains of his army, recruited with the Hessian militia, in such a manner as to protect the course of the Weser. M. Contades, despairing of a passage over the Lippe, reinforced Soubize to 30,000 men, by detachments from the grand army; in order to force a passage over the Weser. Prince Ferdinand, aware of the enemy's intention, detached General Oberg, with a reinforcement of 10,000 men, to Lipstadt, to be at hand and join the Hessians, in case of need: and the motions of the French soon obliged him to join. General Oberg took the chief command of this army, which did not exceed 20,000, and encamped at the strong post of Sanderhausen, upon the Fulda, trying every scheme to provoke the French to attack him in his trenches. But the Prince of Soubize could not be drawn into so dangerous an attempt, though his army consisted of near 30,000 effective

Allied army quartered on the Lippe.

Soubize's army reinforced.

General Oberg sent to watch his motions.

A.D.
1792 effective men. However, the French army being reinforced on the 8th of October, gave strong indications of their resolution, at last, to enter into action. General Oberg was sensible of the enemy's great superiority: but yet his advantageous situation, near Sanderhausen, determined him to wait the issue, in hopes of profiting by some favourable motion. But those motions were designed only to deceive him, and to deprive him of that advantageous situation. With this intention, on the 9th in the morning, Prince Soubize left all his tents standing, and marched his whole army; and, after making different motions,

 he in the evening took possession of the camp near Waldau. General Oberg, with his troops under arms, was in hopes of being attacked. But the motions of the enemy were made at a distance,
 and upon eminences, divided by hollow ways;
 and, as the superiority of the French enabled the Prince of Soubize to send a large detachment, to get round the Hessians, by the road of Munden,
 which would have been of very dangerous consequence, General Oberg's care was to prevent being turned. This determined him to decamp;
 which he did at four next morning, with an intention to entrench himself behind Luttenburg.
 The French, having gained their point, which was, to dislodge him, let him march unmolested:
 but when he was come to the ground for his encampment, they were at his heels; and Oberg
 was obliged to form his troops in order of battle, with his right to the Fulda, and his left to a thicket

Obligated to quit his strong camp

thence upon a rising ground, defended by five ^{A. D.} ^{1758.} pounders. The cavalry supported the wings in a third line: his rear was covered by the village of Lützenberg, and by a strong rising ground furnished with four twelve pounders.

The French army kept a brisk cannonade while Oberge's army was forming, but with very little effect. A considerable body of the enemy filed off at a distance from his left, as if they intended to get possession of a wood on a hill, and so take the Hessians in flank and rear, or pass by to Munden: but our hunters met with them and routed them. The French pushed forwards still more troops, till they posted their left towards the Fulda, and their right far beyond Oberge's left, with upwards of 30 pieces of cannon in their front.

Their
form of battle.

General Oberge did all that any one in his circumstances could do, to oppose the enemy in every part; and it was now four in the afternoon before the French made the attack in form. They began with a very brisk cannonading, which did little execution, being badly situated. At the same instant, they fell upon Major General Zastrow, with their first line of infantry, which General Zastrow attacked with the bayonet and routed. But these brave fellows were broke in a moment by the French cavalry, that took them in front and flank.
The cavalry were then attacked by Oberge's cavalry, with advantage, till they were forced to yield to numbers. The French infantry, that had not been engaged, came on: which obliged the remains of the Hessians to retreat. The French

Roads.

A. D. 1758. then came out almost upon the back of General Oberg's first line; and placed their cannon, at the same time, that all the rest of their army was moving forward. The moment was critical: there was no view of success; and the only minute for a safe retreat was the present. The general, who had constantly given his directions with admirable composure, seized the opportunity, commanded a retreat, which was made with tolerable good order, quite up to the wood, where the defile, which leads to Munden, begins.

General
Oberg retreats.

Had the French pushed with their great superiority in cavalry, the pursuit might have been fatal. But they only continued the fire of their artillery; which, though it was very briskly brought on by the Duke de Broglie, did no considerable damage; except overthrowing some artillery and waggons.

Evacuates Munden.

General Oberg passed by Munden, at midnight; withdrew the garrison, encamped on the plain near Grupen, on the other side the Weser; and next morning, (the 11th) marched to the camp near Gunterheim, without molestation. The French in all their motions had discovered their desire to make themselves masters of Munden: which town they now found evacuated; and they took possession of it without opposition, tho' it had cost them much blood to get to it: but the season was too far advanced for them to reap any considerable advantages further from this victory.

Intentions
of the French.

However, it was evident, that the conquest of Hanover was their chief point in view. M. Soubise ravaged ravaged the country, and raised heavy contributions; retook Gottingen, and penetrated almost to the walls of Hameln; which alarmed the regency of Hanover, who sent orders to the governor to open the sluices, and prepare for a vigorous defence; and, being afraid of the consequences, they once more sent away the archives, and other state papers, &c. from the capital to Stade.

(A. D. 1758.

In the mean time Captain Scheiter, with 500 horse, swam over the Lippe, fell upon a party of 160 French horse, took some prisoners, and totally defeated the rest. He then proceeded towards Wesel, seized a convoy of 30 waggons with flour and wine, and 100 oxen, without the loss of a man; who fired at from the ramparts of Wesel.

Skirmishes on the Lippe.

The defeat of General Oberg finished the campaign on this side of Germany: and had it not been for the vigilance and wise dispositions of Prince Ferdinand, it might have been more favourable to the French. For they, who had been in the beginning of the year, driven by the allies out of Hanover, Hesse, Westphalia, and back over the Rhine, were now masters of both sides of the Rhine, in possession of Cassel and Munden, threatening the gates of Hanover, and in a condition to penetrate into Westphalia; where they established their winter quarters. Prince Ferdinand fixed his head quarters at Munster, and disposed of his army in the landgravate of Hesse, and in the bishopricks of Munster, Paderborn, and Hildesheim; the severity of the season not permitting any attempt to be made upon the French

French, masters of the Rhine.

Prince Ferdinand goes into winter quarters at Munster.

A. D.
1758.

after the junction of the British troops; whose commander in chief, the Duke of Marlborough, died of a dysentery, at Munster, a distemper contracted by the unwholesomeness of the climate, and by the fatigues, to which he had never been accustomed.

Wise disposition of Prince
Ferdinand.

But we must not finish this account without doing justice to the great generalship shewn on this occasion, by Prince Ferdinand. Had not his foresight established a ready communication of his troops all along the Lippe, the defeat of Oberg might have been fatal to the cause of the allies: but this wise disposition of his army, prevented the advantage, which otherwise the French might have gained by that victory. His Serene Highness, upon the first advice of the disaster, marched with the utmost diligence towards Rheda, and, having ordered Prince Ysemburg to fall back, joined his troops; and thereby he covered the Weser, without losing any thing on the side of the Rhine. For, though the electorate of Hanover was somewhat exposed by these movements, he knew the strength and position of the enemy so perfectly well, that he was under no sort of apprehension, that they could be able to make any establishment in it, nor act farther, than the damage, that might be done by their light troops, who were provided, by direction from their court, to run all risks, so that they carried off, or destroyed, all the provisions and forage on the higher Lippe, about Paderborn and Warburg, in all Westphalia and Hesse; from Lipstadt and Munster,

French destroy the forage and provisions
in Hesse,
&c.

A. D. 1758.

ter, as far as the Rhine; and from the higher Elbe and Paderborn, as far as Cassel; as you'll find particularly commanded and described by M. de Belleisle's letters in the margin; in order to prevent

The Marshal Duc de Belleisle to Marshal Contades, dated Versailles, July 23. 1758. in which there is the following passage:

"I am still afraid that Fischer sets out too late: it is, however, very important, and very essential, that we should raise large contributions: I see no other resource for our most urgent expences, and for refitting the troops, but in the money we may draw from the enemy's country; from whence we must likewise procure subsistence of all kinds, (independently of the money) that is to say, hay, straw, oats, for the winter, bread, corn, cattle, horses, and even men, to recruit our foreign troops. The war must not be prolonged, and perhaps it may be necessary, according to the events which may happen, between this and the end of September, to make a downright desert before the line of the quarters, which it may be thought proper to keep during the winter, in order that the enemy may be under a real impossibility of approaching us: at the same time reserving for ourselves a bare subsistence on the route, which may be the most convenient for us to take, in the middle of winter, to beat up, or seize upon the enemy's quarters. That this object may be fulfilled, I cause the greatest assiduity to be used in preparing what is necessary for having all your troops, without exception, well clothed, well armed, well equipped, and well refitted, in every respect, before the end of November, with new tents, in order that, if it shall be advisable for the King's political and military affairs, you may be well able to assemble the whole, or part of your army, to act offensively, and with vigour, from the beginning of January: and that you may have the satisfaction to show your enemies, and all Europe, that the French know how to act, and carry on war, in all seasons, when they have such a ge-

ADD
1738

prevent Prince Ferdinand's return to the Rhine,
or the Lohr, in the beginning of next campaign,
and

neral as you are, and a minister of the department of war, that can foresee, and concert matters with the general.

You must be sensible, Sir, that what I say to you may become not only useful and honourable, but perhaps even necessary, with respect to what you know, and of which I shall say more in my private letter.

M. DUC DE BULLOIS.

This was not the only letter among them, wherein directions were given for making a downright desert of the countries, for it appears by a letter dated in September following, (1758)
as follows :

" You must, at any rate, consume all sort of subsistence on the higher Lippe, in the neighbourhood of Paderborn, and in the country which lies betwixt the Lippe, Paderborn, and Warbourg; this will be so much subsistence taken from the enemy from this day to the end of October. That you must destroy every thing which you cannot consume, so as to make a desert of all Westphalia, from Lipstadt and Munster, as far as the Rhine, on one hand, and on the other, from the higher Lippe and Paderborn, as far as Cassel; that the enemy may find it quite impracticable to direct their march to the Rhine, or to the lower Roer; and this with regard to your army, and with regard to the army under Mons. de Soubise, that they may not have it in their power to take possession of Cassel, and much less to march to Marbourg, or to the quarters which he will have along the Lohr, or to those which you will occupy, from the lower part of the left side of the Roer, and on the right side of the Rhine as far as Düsseldorf, and at Cologne."

In another, dated October 5, is the following passage :

" What makes it the more necessary to render all Westphalia a desert, is, that we have certain advice, that the King of Prussia has formed a project, which has been approved of by
the

and to keep their own quarters undisturbed during the winter. — This was a most barbarous and detestable

AcDA
1758

the King of England, for carrying on the war during a great part of the winter, believing that this will be the surest means of distressing us; and people are now actually employed at Hamburgh, and in all the great towns, in making great coats, light boots, gloves, caps, and calots for their troops. But if, after all these precautions, they shall be obliged to carry their forage from the lower Wester by land, in order to attack our quarters on the lower part of the Roer and on the Rhine, they will never be able to succeed in it, because of the impracticability of the roads at that season of the year, and of the length of the way: they will therefore have no resource left but the lower Rhine, and even there they must go upon the canals and territories of Holland. I make no doubt of your being able to raise sufficient obstacles against any such attempt, and that you will take all the necessary precautions for that purpose."

And in a third, (October 30) there is the following: "You know the necessity of consuming, or destroying, as far as possible, all the subsistence, especially the forage, betwixt the Wester and the Rhine, on the one hand: and on the other, betwixt the Lippe, the bishopric of Paderborn, the Dymel, the Felde, and the Nerra; and so to make a desert of Westphalia and Hesse."

A paragraph in another letter is worded still stronger, as follows: "The upper part of the Lippe, and the country of Paderborn, are the most fertile, and the most plentiful; they must, therefore, be eat up to the very roots: and as Mons. de Soubise, for the reasons above-mentioned, neither must, nor ought, to follow the enemy into the country of Hanover, he will probably only keep with him what troops are necessary for the security of Cassel."

And in another part of the same letter, he says, "I see Prince Ferdinand is at Munster: I am told, that he has ordered the magazines at Osnabruck to be brought there. It will be detestable resolution in an enemy, that arise up their own humanity and politeness on all occasions! However, the gallant young general, that commanded the allies, penetrated into this ruinous secret also, and took his measures so effectually, that defeated a great part of their infamous scheme.

A. D.
1758.

Affairs of Prussia.

We left the King of Prussia in the enjoyment of some advantages after his raising the siege of Olmutz, and preparing to transfer the seat of war from Moravia into Bohemia. But he was soon deprived of that advantage by the Russians, who, after several months marching and counter-marching through Poland and Prussia, in which they committed excesses of violence and cruelty, to the disgrace of human nature, sat down, with 90,000 men, and a formidable train of artillery, to besiege Custrin, a little town on the Elbe, almost without fortifications, though the capital of the New Marche of Brandenburg, situate at the influx of the river Warthe into the Oder, three German miles from Frankfort: which are the principal passages from the New into the Middle Marche. But its situation is naturally strong: for the river Warthe incloses one part thereof, till it falls into the Oder; and the Oder incloses almost the other part. The other avenues are encompassed by

Russians
march against Custrin.
Custrin
described.

very vexatious, if he should be able to maintain so great a quarter so near you. This is one reason more for depriving him of all other means, by wasting the country, especially what lies betwixt the Lippe and the Roer, and all that is in the country of La Marck and Waldeck."

See page 156, Vol. III.

broad

land morasses: and from its long suburb there is no other road to the city, but over a causeway, three quarters of a German mile in length, with 53 bridges over the morasses. Its chief artificial strength consists in a bridge over the Oder, defended by a battery, and a well built castle. The garrison consisted of no more than one battalion of regulars, one battalion of militia, two companies of invalids, and about 100 hussars.

The first appearance of the Russians before this city, was on the 13th of August, at three in the afternoon. This was a body of their hussars and cossacks. The piquet guard in the suburb was immediately augmented to about 300 men, who were soon attacked by the enemy: which skirmish lasted from four till seven in the evening; when the enemy retired; and the garrison broke down the bridge over the Oder.

Count Dohna, who commanded the Prussian army encamped near Frankfort on the Oder, being applied to by the governor of Custrin, detached a reinforcement of four battalions of infantry, ten squadrons of dragoons, and a small body of hussars, under Lieutenant-General Schorlemmer, who arrived next day. The hussars and a body of dragoons were added to the piquet in the little suburb, and the four battalions of grenadiers encamped on the Anger, between the suburb and the fortification: the remainder of the ten squadrons of dragoons encamped in the fields, to cover the long suburb. At the same time, there arrived Colonel Schack, with the commission of governor,

A. D.
1758.

to which A allies

Russians
appear before Custrin.

Skirmish.

the Russian
army
was defeated.

Garrison
reinforced.

A. D.
1738.

governor, or commander in chief, in case of a siege.

City bombarded.

There was little or no appearance of an enemy
on the 14th, except a party of Cossacks, who pursued General Schorlemmer and Governor Schack, quite up to the city gates, as they went with a small party to reconnoitre the enemy: but on the 15th
in the morning, between four and five o'clock,
the citizens were awakened and terrified by the noise and shrieks of the hussars and Cossacks, intermixed with cannon ball. As the enemy's troops advanced and took their stations, and brought their batteries to bear, the Prussians, the piquet guard, hussars, dragoons, &c. were obliged to retire into the city, or wherever they could best provide for their own safety. Having no other object to combat than the town, the Russians, in less than half an hour after the battalions had retired from the Anger, threw such a multitude of bombs and red hot shot into the city, that it was

On fire.

on fire in several parts, and burnt with such fury,
at nine o'clock, that there was no extinguishing
the flames in the narrow streets; and the element appeared to rain and hail fire: which drove the inhabitants to seek for protection and safety in the open fields. The houses tumbled on all sides,

Distress of the inhabitants.

Every body that could creep, got out of the town
as fast as possible; and the crowd of naked, and in the highest degree wretched people, was vastly great, without distinction of persons: some few with horses and carriages, others with sleds and bed-ridden upon their backs, thought themselves happy,

happy, if they could escape the showers of bombs, cannon balls and red hot bullets. A. D. 1758.

Not only the inhabitants, but many thousand strangers, from the open country and defenceless towns in Prussia, Pomerania, and the New Marche, that had fled here with their valuable effects, when the Russians entered the Prussian territories, in hopes of a safe retreat, were now made most miserable, and reduced from opulent fortunes, to beggary. On the roads, nothing was seen but misery: nothing heard but cries and lamentations, enough to move stones; as nobody knew where to get a morsel of bread, nor what to do for further subsistence. The neighbouring towns and villages were soon filled with the most deplorable objects of distress. Within, the great magazine, the governor's house, the church, the palace, the store and artillery houses; in a word, the old and new town, the suburbs and the great bridge over the Oder, as well as all the others, were reduced to ashes. Of the inhabitants, many perished in the flames, were knocked on the head under the ruins, or suffocated in the vaults and subterraneous caverns, where they, in their fright, sought for safety. The public records or archives of the state were destroyed, and a prodigious quantity of corn and flour was consumed in the conflagration. The fire was so furious, that the cannon in the store and artillery houses were all melted: and the loaded bombs, the cartridges for cannon and muskets, a large quantity of powder and other combustibles

Houses,
&c. burnt.

went

A.D.
1758Inhumanity of the enemy.

went off, at once, with a horrible explosion.—A spectacle so terrible, that no history can furnish a like example, except the destruction of Jerusalem. What is more inhuman, the enemy's fury was vented entirely upon the innocent inhabitants; for they did not begin to batter the fortifications, except by a few shot, till the 17th, when the rest were all destroyed. But what could be expected from an enemy, that had disgraced the name of human creatures in all their previous operations.

What colour can the Russians give to their burning the villages of Zorndorf, Zicher, Wilkerdorf, Blumberg, Kuddorf, Quastichen, and Birkenbusch, all which were in flames at the same time, and of which the greatest part of the inhabitants were, some killed, and others thrown into the flames. The public hath already been informed of the cruelties committed last June, by General Demikow, in Pomerania, and the New Marche. Above an hundred towns or villages were pillaged, and many women carried off and ravished. The Russians also set fire to the village of Purtschau, and killed the farmer's wife. Vorchach, and the suburb of Driesen, were likewise reduced to ashes. In the beginning of July, they pillaged the town of Friedeburgh, burnt the mill of Altenflies, and murdered the gardener of the balliwick of Driesen. On the approach of the Prussians, they turned the environs of Custrin into a desert, burnt the seven villages abovementioned, killed the farmer of Tamsel, and at Blumberg and Camin massacred many peasants, and even infants with their mothers, whose mutilated bodies were found in the houses and barns. The churches have not been spared; they opened even graves and vaults, to strip the dead, which they did, particularly, at Camin and Birkenholz, where they strip the bodies of General Schladerdorf and General Ruitz, who were buried there. It will not be thought strange, that the name of barbarians should be given to persons capable of such cruelties.

His

His Prussian Majesty could not remain indifferent on this occasion: and though he had all the reason in the world to flatter himself with the hopes of success in Bohemia, where he had occupied the post of Nuchod, by his Lieutenant General Pouchot, and, in person, had driven General Laudon from Oppetschau, and had obliged Count Daun to fortify himself on the hills of Libischau, he could not deny his faithful and brave garrison of Custrin his immediate assistance. He left his camp at Königgratz, and after some skirmishes, wherein he lost General Saldern and Colonel Blanckenburg, who were killed by the Pandours, at the first discharge, as they retreated
 from the suburbs of Königgratz, he, on the 9th of August, encamped at Landshut, and from thence proceeded with a detachment, in order to join the army at Frankfort under Count Dohna, where he arrived on the 22d, the garrison of Custrin still holding out against the mighty army and incessant fire of the Russians, without having a house to cover their heads from the heat of the day or the heat of action.—His Majesty's forces being joined, they were ordered to march at ten o'clock
 the same night, and next day he passed the Oder, by a bridge thrown over at Gatsvise, and he took up his quarters at Golassan. Here he rested his army till one o'clock next day at noon, and proceeded to Dirmitzel, where he encamped and made the necessary dispositions for attacking the enemy next day.

A.D. 1758.

King of Prussia
marches
against the Russians.

On

A. D.
1758.

Advanced
towards the enemy's camp.

Reſent-
ment of the Prussian
ſoldiery.

On the 25th the Prussian army marched in four columns, three of infantry, and one of cavalry: the vanguard consisted of ten battalions, commanded by Lieutenant-General Manteuffel. He endeavoured, by this march, to wind round the enemy's left flank: so that, having passed the small river Mitzel, he filed off by the forest of Maſſin, and the village of Bazela, into the plain; where both infantry and cavalry spread themselves on the left flank, till they arrived at Zorn-dorff, on the back of the enemy; who had broke up the siege of Cuſtrin, and drawn up their army on a narrow ground, in four lines; forming a front on every ſide, and ſurrounded with cannon and chevaux de frise. His Majesty arrived in the presence of the enemy at eight o'clock in the morning, and immediately formed in order of battle; his troops, emperated at the sight of ſo many marks of Ruſſian cruelty in every place through which they marched, ardently wiſhed for the opportunity to engage, and to avenge their countrymen of ſuch cruel ſcenes. They looked upon their preſent ſervice to be, in the ſtrictest ſenſe, fighting for their country; and that nothing but victory could deliver it from one of the ſevereſt ſcourges with which providence did ever chaſtiſe a nation. Even the exiſtence of the Prussian crown depended on the ſucceſs of the day. By theſe means the ſoldiers, nay, the King himſelf, might be ſaid to have been emperated to a pitch of military enthuſiaſm: and in this this enthusiastic rage they began and fought the most bloody conflict during the whole war.

A. D.
1758.

The action began at nine o'clock in the morning (the 15th) near the village of Zorndorff, and lasted till seven at night. The fire of the artillery was inexhaustible; for two hours, at least, the

The battle began. A new moment
of
the

Prussian artillery rained on the Russians like showers from the heavens. Amidst this furious cannonade, the most dreadful that ever man beheld, the Russians stood undaunted. The Muscovite infantry were

The fury
of the Prussians;

attacked first, with an impetuosity enough to stagger the bravest veterans of any civilized nation: but they stood like images; they fell in their ranks, and new regiments pressed forward to supply new slaughter. They were so insensible of danger, or

The intrepidity of the Russians.

indifferent, as to their own particular fate, that when the first line had fired away all their cartridges, they obstinately stood in that defenceless condition,

desert A uniquely

to be shot at, like marks. If this may be called resistance, the Russian infantry must be allowed to have made a very great resistance; and that the only way to gain a victory over such troops, was to de-

Robert
ment of Prussian
troops
to the battle

stroy them. The slaughter, in course, became very great: but their army was numerous; fresh bodies continually presented themselves, and made the most vigorous efforts; and if they, who are fatigued, can be said to give way, it is certain that the

Prussian infantry were so fatigued with the work of carnage, that at length they gave way, even so far as to make the action doubtful on the Prussian left; till General Seidlitz, who commanded the Prussian cavalry,

A. D. 1704. The Russian army, being thus flag and king, and the Russian cavalry, being their right wing, endeavouring to improve the advantage, threw himself into the close, at the head of his own regiment of guards
 du corps, and the general army, rested the Russian cavalry, that knew not how to make use of the advantage, and then fell upon the infantry with an impetuosity they were not able to withstand;
 for, being elated first by the work they had already got through, or disheartened by the approach of the horse, and having lost their support,
 and the wind blowing the dust and smoke in their faces, they fell back all on a sudden, broke their ranks in such confusion, that they fired upon one another, and plundered their own baggage. By this time the Prussian infantry was rallied, and being led to the charge by the king in person, the slaughter became more shocking than ever. They drove the Russians into a narrow pass, and continued the fight till seven o'clock with such regular fires, that every shot had its full effect. The Russians, forced, at last, to quit the field of battle, formed themselves into a square, in order to cover the remaining part of their baggage;
 and passed the night in that position: the darkness of the night obliging both parties to cease hostilities; which the King, who likewise maintained his ground, renewed next morning by a cannonade. But the Russians soon gave way, abandoning their artillery and a great number of colours, standards, &c. The king did not give

Their cavalry rout-
 ed.

A terrible slaughter.

Parted by the night.

Battle renewed.

Russians
 give way.

chasing the opportunity to recover, but halting stops all day on every quarter. Neither could it put a stop to the effusion of blood. The cruelty of all sorts committed by the enemy, and the sight of the many villages round about, which the Russians had set on fire, irritated the soldiers to such a degree, that it was almost impossible to put a stop to their fury.

Great dependance had been placed, by the confederates against Prussia, on the success of this day.
 If victory should declare against Prussia, her monarch must have submitted to the terms of the confederacy. If the fortune of the day should turn in favour of Prussia, it was to be feared, not only that his Prussian Majesty would return with more vigour and strength, to complete his scheme in Saxony and Bohemia; but that the Russians would be dispirited, and brought with difficulty, if at all,
 back to favour their operations this campaign.

Therefore, when the news of this battle was carried to Vienna, that court had the address, or rather the confidence, to decide the fate of the arms,
 in this engagement, in favour of their confederate Russians, in order to keep the Czarina in good temper towards her engagements; but what is most

Dependence of the Austrians
 on this battle.

Misrepresented by the court of Vienna.

* The account, which the court of Vienna has thought fit to publish of this affair, is to this effect: "That on the 25th of last month the Prussians came up at nine in the morning to attack the Russians, who, in order of battle, waited for them;
 but the Prussians were so ill, that the Russian army was pulled with great loss. The King afterwards made a new attack, which succeeded no better than the first. In fine, these

THE GENERAL HISTORY OF

and surprising the very General that went to Count Dohna, for leave to bury his dead, asserts his claim to the victory of this day, in a letter to the Russian minister at the Hague?

The
 two camps having proved fruitless, the King, by a most rigorous march, brought all the cavalry of his army, and having quite changed the order of battle, he caused his cavalry to ride full gallop against the center of the Russian army, whereby he separated the two wings of this army, and forced the left to fall back into the morasses that lay behind it.

While this wing was in this perplexing situation, it called for firing upon its adversaries, and a huge detachment from the right came to its assistance. This relief caused the Russian army, and drove the enemy, who were pushed in such a manner, that the same day, the arch, it was put in the same position as at the beginning of the battle. The 26th Talman was slain in the Russian army, which surprised the King of Prussia so much, that he immediately ordered an army to advance, but was so well received by the Russians, that he thought fit to order a retreat; yet, he made his army return a second time to the charge, but they were repulsed again.

This relation, which one may look upon as certain, and bearing all the marks of strict truth, shows how censurable
 the Berlin Gazette is, for continuing to maintain such absolutely opposed, and the strange exaggeration which he has presumed to stir on this event.

The letter which Count Dohna, the Russian minister at the Hague, received on this occasion, was to the following effect:

His Excellency to Great Britain, August 31.

I have the honour to inform your Excellency, that on the 25th of this month there was a bloody battle between the army under my command, and that of France, commanded by the King of Prussia, which lasted from nine in the morning till six in the evening, and ended in the total defeat of the French army.

of the Russian army, and the victory, and that
 that the loss did not exceed 2000 men killed, wounded, and prisoners; but make the loss of the Russians 10,000 killed, 10,000 wounded, and most of them mortally, and about 2000 prisoners; besides an immense train of artillery, thirty-seven colours, five standards, several katala drums, and their military chest, containing 200,000 sterling in specie.

Lost on
 both sides.

Not only these extraordinary losses evidence the right of victory in favour of his Prussian Majesty;
 but it is clear from the consequences. The King delivered that part of his dominions from his enemies for the present, and was at liberty to march directly to the assistance of his brother. Besides the number of prisoners of rank, amongst whom were several generals, the loss of so great a train of artillery, and the necessity the Russians were under, to be leave to bury their dead, and corroborating

and retired. The next day we buried the slain. We have taken to us many pieces of cannon, and a great number of standards and colours from the enemy. I am with the army in sight of the enemy, and only wait for M. de Rastum's division, which is to join me tomorrow, to perfect and entirely disperse the Russians. I do not find you at this time the journal of the army, being too busy at present, but will not fail to acquaint your Excellency with what may afterwards happen.

It is my duty to inform your Excellency, that on the 25th of this month there was a bloody battle between the Prussian and Russian armies, in which the Prussians were victorious. The Russian army was defeated, and the Prussian army is now pursuing them. I am with the army, and will keep you informed of all the particulars.

THE GENERAL HISTORY OF

At D. extraordinary circumstances to confirm the truth of 1758. the Prussian account of the battle and victory over the Russian army near Culm.

His Majesty is fit to conclude a suspension of arms, for two or three days? General Brown, who is extremely weak, by reason of his wounds, having need of a room, and other conveniences, which are necessary in his present situation, most humbly intreats his Majesty to send a passport for him and his attendants, that he may remove to a proper place. I have the honour to be, &c.

Camp, August 14, (45. N. S.) 1758.

Count FRANK.

Count DEBANS's Answer.

I have the honour to answer the letter, which your excellency was pleased to write to me yesterday; and, in consequence of it, to inform you, that the King, my master, having gained the battle, and remained master of the field, his Majesty will not fail to give the necessary orders for burying the dead, and taking care of the wounded on both sides. His Majesty thinks that a suspension of arms is usual, in the case of a siege, but not after a battle. His excellency General Brown, if still alive, shall have the passports he likes most readily; and all possible relief shall be given to the other generals, who are prisoners.

The cruel burning of villages, which is not yet discontinued, shews an intention not to spare the King's estates in any shape. But I shall not now enter into repetitions on a subject I have so often mentioned. I shall only desire your excellency to consider, what consequences such cruelties may have, if a stop be not put to them. I have the honour to be, &c.

Camp, Aug. 26, 1758.

Count DOWN.

His Prussian Majesty's letter to his ministers abroad, was conceived in the following terms.

August 26.

I would not defer for a moment giving you notice of the complete victory which heaven has just granted to my arms

over

His Prussian Majesty was equally as expeditious in his return, as he had been rapid in his march to Custrin. His absence was no sooner known in Bohe-

A.D.
1758
The Auftrians take advantage of his Majesty's absence.

over the great Russian army, commanded by General Suvorov.
The battle was fought yesterday, the 25th, between Custrin and Tannenberg. As I had to do with an army greatly superior, and provided with a very numerous artillery, the engagement was long and obstinate, and lasted till the close of night; but the defeat of the enemy hath been the greater and more decisive. I shall not permit me to enter into a detail of the circumstances of this action: I shall reserve a more ample account of it till next post. All I can tell you now is, that the loss of the Russians is very great. I have taken three of their Lieutenant-generals, many cannon, and their military chest.
My troops fought with uncommon bravery, and like men who defended their country. These are the first circumstances I can give you of this great event, which will give a new turn to affairs, and in which heaven seems to have interposed so remarkably, in order to enable me to disappoint the destructive projects which my enemies had formed for the devastation and ruin of my dominions.

FREEDOM.

This letter was soon followed by a second.

Luben, Sept. 28.

I have at length reaped the fruits of my last victory over the Russians. Superior as they were in number, even after their defeat, they took an advantageous camp three leagues from the field of battle, where they halted till the 21st of August, to collect the run-aways, and secure their retreat. On that day they at last took a resolution to retreat towards Poland, by Lutzen, after setting fire to the greater part of their baggage. I have sent General Manteuffel in pursuit of them; and General Malchowsky hath already had an opportunity to attack their rear, and hath taken three pieces of cannon, and several flags and several hundred prisoners.

THE GENERAL HISTORY OF

Germany, then the arrival of Austrian, Saxon, and Imperialist troops, which caused great alarm of the Emperor. He was informed that the Duke of Brunswick, under the command of his brother Henry, at Dippoldswalde, and marched with full hopes of making considerable conquests of Saxony, Silesia, and parts of Brandenburg and Lusatia. The Duke, however, Prince Henry, and, during his long encampment in the mountains, he brought his army to Stolpen, east of the Elbe, to cut off all communication with Dresden, and to favour the operations of his party. General Laudon was ordered to pursue the army of Oeder, which he performed with great success. The Duke of Brunswick, who commanded the army, was obliged to retreat, and, after some small successes, entered Saxony, and made himself master of Torgau, and of the strong fortress of Grossenhayn. He then marched on to Leipzig, and a general battle took place, which was a very bloody and long one, and the result was a small space of time. The Duke's army, however, discovered greater tokens of fear, than his enemies, at his retreat. His Prussian ally, however, did not follow him, and he was enabled to retreat to Torgau, and then to Leipzig, and finally to Dresden. He then made a stand, and fought the battle of Leipzig, which was a very bloody and long one, and the result was a small space of time. The Duke's army, however, discovered greater tokens of fear, than his enemies, at his retreat. His Prussian ally, however, did not follow him, and he was enabled to retreat to Torgau, and then to Leipzig, and finally to Dresden. He then made a stand, and fought the battle of Leipzig, which was a very bloody and long one, and the result was a small space of time. The Duke's army, however, discovered greater tokens of fear, than his enemies, at his retreat. His Prussian ally, however, did not follow him, and he was enabled to retreat to Torgau, and then to Leipzig, and finally to Dresden. He then made a stand, and fought the battle of Leipzig, which was a very bloody and long one, and the result was a small space of time.

prudent, and so the Duke of Prussia, encamped more strongly than before, with bridges of communication that made the Elbe. He had no hopes in any other way, than to place himself, as to be able to see their provisions. With this intention his Majesty marched to Bautzen, in which station he could communicate with Prince Henry's
 army, cover Brandenburg, and succour Siloka;
 which obliged Daun to retreat to Zittau, and from thence to Ratis, in hopes of some favourable circumstance to enable him to attack the Prussians with advantage, but he perceived the King was too strong for him, and he was obliged to retreat to the line of Neumark. As the Austrian government, Austrians his army advanced, with the hope of some retreat.
 him, to determine or to pursue the Prussians, he never thought of it, but he was too cautious, and do-not take advantage of the opportunity, which he should
 The Prussians, however, did not let the Austrians from the village of Hoch-Kirch, and occupied in its neighbourhood, but he failed to occupy the heights that commanded that village. This King's oversight was readily discovered by M. Daun, M. Daun
 By this way it was possible to penetrate through the flank of the enemy, and that was sufficient disconcert, and in all probability to ruin the whole Prussian army. The cautious Daun seized the opportunity, and concerted measures with the Imperial general, for carrying his design into execution; employed the flower of his whole army in this important service, and pitched upon a very dark night for the surprize. The night between

A. D.
1738.

Attacks him in his tent.

How conducted.

M. Keith
killed.

King of Prussia's
conduct and bravery.

the 13th and 14th of October, favored his design. It was not only dark, but very foggy. The troops moved, in three columns, with great secrecy, and after gaining the heights above mentioned, they poured down upon the village of Black-Kitchen, cut to pieces a few companies posted there, and gained possession of that advantageous post.

[illegible]

The King, alarmed in the midst of an horrible carnage, exerted all his personal activity, recollection

the 13th and 14th of October, favoured his design. It was not only dark, but very foggy. The troops moved in three columns, with great secrecy, and after gaining the heights above mentioned, they poured down upon the village of Hoch-Kirschen, cut to pieces a few companies posted in it,
 and gained possession of the advantageous post.

FIELD MARSHAL KEITH.
 The King had the whole conduct upon his own
 hands, when he most wanted assistance.
 The King, alarmed in the midst of an horrid
 carnage, exerted all his personal activity, recollection

A.D. 1758.
 Attacks him in his centre.
 How can he be the Prussian before the
 in the were rewe he
 by K.
 ev-vig-
 of troop lack
 that K.
 P. cannon ball, as he was hurrying his horse. The lot of
 the danger, as well as the conduct of his party.
 The King had the whole conduct upon his own
 hands, when he most wanted assistance.
 The King, alarmed in the midst of an horrid
 carnage, exerted all his personal activity, recollection
 King of Prussia's
 conduct
 and his

lection and address, and made the best dispositions, and opposed the efforts of the enemy in the best manner he could, in so dark a night, and such confusion. He was present every where, animating his troops with the greatest presence of mind, and exposing his own person to the same dangers which he called upon them to face: a conduct that served him in more stead, at that critical juncture, than his arms; and in some measure prevented the unfortunate blow, under which his cause might probably have sunk.

M. Daun had undertaken the grand attack of the Prussian right wing, where the King commanded, and had taken proper measures not only to secure, but to deprive it of all means of reinforcement. So that, when his Prussian Majesty grew conscious of his own strength, and found himself hard pressed, he could get no assistance from his left wing, which was at that instant vigorously attacked by the Austrians, when he sent for a large detachment from thence, to reinforce his right wing. However, this would not have been sufficient to oblige him to retreat, had the attack on the village of Hoch-Kirchen failed. The possession of this post determined the fate of the day. The dispute was hottest there. M. Daun charged General Laudohn with that part of the attack. This general, as above, surprised the free companies in it, and cut them to pieces. The Prussians, sensible of the importance of this village, attacked the Austrians with the utmost fury; but they were repulsed, once, twice, and thrice.

A. D.
1758.Notables
draw help
from his left wing.been at 1758in your country habits
and but

THE GENERAL HISTORY OF

which could drive every both sides. They a fourth small-cared the post after a moment's pause and baptist's dispute. But Dava's fate the depending chiefly on the possession of this village, he was then resolved to make every possible effort to regain it,
and by reiterated attacks with fresh troops continually pouring down upon it, he drove the Brahmins out, at last, but not without an exceeding great loss of his men.

Thus deprived of his best officers, not in a condition to draw any advantage from his left,
driven out of his most important posts, having lost a great number of men and officers, and despairing of victory, his Majesty resolved to retreat
about one o'clock in the morning: and though the soldiers had never been properly drawn up in order, and were embarrassed by their tents, which continued standing during the whole action, the retreat was performed in good order, and without further loss, to the astonishment of all, under the cover of a great fire from the Prussian artillery,
when on that occasion was placed in the center of his van.

There is something extremely surprising throughout this whole affair: and from every point rays of glory thence to Prussian Majesty. Here we read of an army under the command of the greatest generals of the age, sur-prized in such a fatal manner, that the out-guards
could not give the alarm of the enemy's approach.
Here also we read of an inferior army surprized in their sleep, running half-naked to their arms, recovering

Resolves to retreat.

In good order.

Remarks
on this
action.

standing them down, fighting desperately; but his death laid at last a stop to such an order; and that the enemy durst not pursue. Here the King's generalship appeared with the greatest lustre, when he most wanted wisdom and courage. The wing attacked was at a great distance from his own quarters: two of his principal commanders of it were slain at the first onset; others were taken prisoners; the whole wing were ready to turn their backs upon the enemy: yet his Majesty galloped up to the seat of greatest danger, and drew some regularity from disorder, arranged the different corps, altered positions, reinforced weak posts, encouraged the soldiery; twice repulsed the enemy, attacked them four times; and being overborn only by numbers and fatigue, made an orderly retreat. These are actions that were never found in any general before, and are to be looked for only in that grand resource of military abilities, the King of Prussia.

His Prussian Majesty fell back with his right wing to Weissenbourg: his left remained at Baumtzen: and he fixed his head quarters at Doberschütz or Deebuschütz, from whence he wrote to all his ministers at foreign courts, "Having acquainted you by the last post with the first circumstances

His own account of this battle.

Whitehall, October 24.

This morning a messenger arrived at the Earl of Holderness's office, with letters from Arthur Mitchell, Esq; His Majesty's minister to the King of Prussia, dated the 16th instant from Dresden, importing,

That

the most exact truth; in which I own my loss,

The first of these was the loss of the town of ... The second was the loss of the town of ... The third was the loss of the town of ... The fourth was the loss of the town of ... The fifth was the loss of the town of ... The sixth was the loss of the town of ... The seventh was the loss of the town of ... The eighth was the loss of the town of ... The ninth was the loss of the town of ... The tenth was the loss of the town of ... The eleventh was the loss of the town of ... The twelfth was the loss of the town of ... The thirteenth was the loss of the town of ... The fourteenth was the loss of the town of ... The fifteenth was the loss of the town of ... The sixteenth was the loss of the town of ... The seventeenth was the loss of the town of ... The eighteenth was the loss of the town of ... The nineteenth was the loss of the town of ... The twentieth was the loss of the town of ... The twenty-first was the loss of the town of ... The twenty-second was the loss of the town of ... The twenty-third was the loss of the town of ... The twenty-fourth was the loss of the town of ... The twenty-fifth was the loss of the town of ... The twenty-sixth was the loss of the town of ... The twenty-seventh was the loss of the town of ... The twenty-eighth was the loss of the town of ... The twenty-ninth was the loss of the town of ... The thirtieth was the loss of the town of ... The thirty-first was the loss of the town of ... The thirty-second was the loss of the town of ... The thirty-third was the loss of the town of ... The thirty-fourth was the loss of the town of ... The thirty-fifth was the loss of the town of ... The thirty-sixth was the loss of the town of ... The thirty-seventh was the loss of the town of ... The thirty-eighth was the loss of the town of ... The thirty-ninth was the loss of the town of ... The fortieth was the loss of the town of ... The forty-first was the loss of the town of ... The forty-second was the loss of the town of ... The forty-third was the loss of the town of ... The forty-fourth was the loss of the town of ... The forty-fifth was the loss of the town of ... The forty-sixth was the loss of the town of ... The forty-seventh was the loss of the town of ... The forty-eighth was the loss of the town of ... The forty-ninth was the loss of the town of ... The fiftieth was the loss of the town of ... The fifty-first was the loss of the town of ... The fifty-second was the loss of the town of ... The fifty-third was the loss of the town of ... The fifty-fourth was the loss of the town of ... The fifty-fifth was the loss of the town of ... The fifty-sixth was the loss of the town of ... The fifty-seventh was the loss of the town of ... The fifty-eighth was the loss of the town of ... The fifty-ninth was the loss of the town of ... The sixtieth was the loss of the town of ... The sixty-first was the loss of the town of ... The sixty-second was the loss of the town of ... The sixty-third was the loss of the town of ... The sixty-fourth was the loss of the town of ... The sixty-fifth was the loss of the town of ... The sixty-sixth was the loss of the town of ... The sixty-seventh was the loss of the town of ... The sixty-eighth was the loss of the town of ... The sixty-ninth was the loss of the town of ... The seventieth was the loss of the town of ... The seventy-first was the loss of the town of ... The seventy-second was the loss of the town of ... The seventy-third was the loss of the town of ... The seventy-fourth was the loss of the town of ... The seventy-fifth was the loss of the town of ... The seventy-sixth was the loss of the town of ... The seventy-seventh was the loss of the town of ... The seventy-eighth was the loss of the town of ... The seventy-ninth was the loss of the town of ... The eightieth was the loss of the town of ... The eighty-first was the loss of the town of ... The eighty-second was the loss of the town of ... The eighty-third was the loss of the town of ... The eighty-fourth was the loss of the town of ... The eighty-fifth was the loss of the town of ... The eighty-sixth was the loss of the town of ... The eighty-seventh was the loss of the town of ... The eighty-eighth was the loss of the town of ... The eighty-ninth was the loss of the town of ... The ninetieth was the loss of the town of ... The ninety-first was the loss of the town of ... The ninety-second was the loss of the town of ... The ninety-third was the loss of the town of ... The ninety-fourth was the loss of the town of ... The ninety-fifth was the loss of the town of ... The ninety-sixth was the loss of the town of ... The ninety-seventh was the loss of the town of ... The ninety-eighth was the loss of the town of ... The ninety-ninth was the loss of the town of ... The hundredth was the loss of the town of ...

At DA
770

which

"which is not gain, without telling me of
 "such failures as the count of Wurmser & Peterf-
 "burgh usually spread on such occasions. You see "also by this detail that it was not a battle, but
 "an attack of posts only: by which the Austrians
 "gained no other advantage, than that of dislodg-
 "ing my troops from an eminence, without daring
 "to follow me, and without being able to force
 "me to retire above half a league, where I keep
 "my ground and wait for them, ready to begin a
 "second engagement, as soon as the opportunity
 "offers. It is certain that the loss of the enemy "is much greater than mine, a circumstance, of "which you will not fail to avail yourself: that
 "the Austrians may not impose upon the public
 "by false and exaggerated relations."

Consider

"The reader may judge of the justice of his Prussian Ma"jesty's remarks by the account that follows, first published in "the Brussels Gazette, October 30.

Account of the battle fought the 14th of October, 1752, at Hoch-Kirchen in Lusatia, by the Imperial and Royal army, under Field-Marshal Count Daun, and of the complete victory it obtained over that of the King of Prussia, commanded by the King in person.

"The enemy marched on the 10th instant, and came and encamped in sight of the imperial and royal army, their right occupying the eminences of Hoch-Kirchen, and their left extending to Kottitz. The King of Prussia made the more haste to take that position, as he judged it most necessary both to secure the communication with Silesia, by Gortitz, and also to support the body of troops, about some strong, which occupied the advantageous camp of Weissenberg, and which we resolved to attack on the 11th, and cut off from the main body

of

R. R. M. The greatest loss happened in the death of his favourite general M. Keith. This was an irreparable

The Marshal no longer laid his scheme before the general officers of his army; than his attack was unanimously resolved upon. It was indeed been intended to try it; but the large number of the artillery was obliged to make, and the obstacles which stood in the way of those dispositions necessary for executing the success of the enterprise, made it be deferred till next day. The next to decide the King of Prussia, the Marshal had on the right coasted batteries of men to be made in the wood on his left; then to fly, opposite to the right wing of the enemy; and to enter to be killed in proper distances along the front of his own army. At the same time M. de Landoult had orders to post himself near this wood.

All these dispositions being at last completed, the Marshal's plan was executed with all possible exactness. The different columns and the artillery, designed for the attack, having traversed the woods by very different roads, arrived about four in the morning, within gun-shot of the advanced posts of the enemy, without being perceived. At five o'clock all the columns attacked at once; and though some defenders had gone over to the enemy in the night, their reports only served to increase their security; for all that they could tell them was, that our left marched backwards. Before daylight the advanced guards of the columns, and the corps under M. de Landoult, had with great battery made themselves masters of the post of Hoch-Kirchen, and also of the eminences behind the camp. At day-break our foot were possessed of the eminences, and were formed in order of battle in the very camp of the Prussians. A few minutes after this the Duke of Ardenberg attacked their left, and made himself master also of the redoubts the enemy had there. Notwithstanding the obstinate defence of the enemy, they were forced to yield to the vivacity of the attack made by our infantry, which, without being supported by artillery, broke their ranks in some places sword in hand, in others with their bayonets fixed.

reparable misfortune to lose so great a master experienced in the art of war. But every other damage

AD 1758

Our vanguard and grenadiers seeing the enemy driven from Hoch-Kirchen, and their right retiring, listening only to the ardour of their zeal, pushed them, contrary to the Marshal's explicit orders. Mean time the enemy's infantry rallied, and obliged ours to retire. At the same instant Hoch-Kirchen was attacked by the flower of the Prussian troops, and the fire of the artillery and small arms began to be extremely hot.

The enemy, after returning three times to the charge, at length made themselves masters of part of the village: but as the fate of the day depended upon that post, they met with the most vigorous resistance. To sustain this post, the regiments of Clerici, Bathyan, Stachenberg, Vieux-Colleredo, and after them those of Arbers, Los-Rios, and Puella, were made to advance successively, as also the carabiniers and horse grenadiers, under the command of the Count d'Arfise. The regiment of Clerici suffered greatly on this occasion: but that of Bathyan took four colours, and 300 prisoners. While the Marshal was doing his utmost to support our troops at Hoch-Kirchen, the rest of our left kept a continual fire upon the enemy without coming to a close engagement, till they were sure that we should be absolutely masters of that important post. The unshaken armaments of the imperial and royal troops having at length deprived the Prussians of all hope of retaking it, they retired under the fire of a numerous artillery, which was placed in the center of their camp. Field-Marshal Keith, who commanded the right of the enemy in this bloody battle, was killed, as were Prince Francis of Brunswick and General Kleib. The former was interred, after the battle, with all the honours due to his rank.

While the battle was fought with so great warmth on that side, the horse of our left were forced to give way; but by the indefatigable zeal of Count O'Donnel, general of horse, and the other generals, they were immediately rallied; Count Lacy, on his side, with five companies of horse grenadiers and carabiniers, and six regiments of Dragoon, and damage of his army might be easily repaired. Therefore we see his Majesty waiting for the enemy

A.D.
1752

O'Donnel, O'Donnell, Anhalt, and Bismarck, who upon the enemy's foot were now making against our left. The bravery of these troops was our former advantages, and the conduct of the general, who commanded them, greatly contributed to the success of the action. M. de Tilly, Major-general, was the first slain. But, notwithstanding, on this memorable day, no less skill than bravery.

The terrible fire of the Prussian artillery and small arms having greatly thinned the ranks of our host, the Marshal made them close as much as possible, and again led them against the enemy. At the same time, Baron Bismarck and the Duke of Arenberg, forced their way through the files, which they had orders to pass, and the continued fire they made upon the enemy, forced them to retire. A part of the infantry and cavalry, which composed the corps of Williamburg, attempted to go to the assistance of the Duke of the Palatinate. But Baron Bismarck immediately called the regiments of O'Donnel and Anhalt-Zerbst, commanded by the Generals Count de Zallern and Bismarck, to advance, who attacked the head of this reinforcement with so much vigour, that it was no longer attacked, that retired.

Seeing themselves thus vanquished on every side, not by superiority of numbers, but solely by the violence of our weapons, the enemy retired, to gain the eminence behind them, which favoured their retreat. At nine o'clock their fire became considerably, and they wholly retired to the plain of Friedland, where the good conductance of their cavalry gave the rest of their army time to form.

All was over by ten, and the Marshal sent M. de Lutzel, with three regiments of dragoon, viz. those of Lowenstein, Dour-Pont, and Detmold, to pursue the enemy.

We took the whole camp of the Prussians and all their baggage. The prisoners of each regiment had scarce time to take to their arms. The number of cannon we took at the beginning of the affair, during the action, and in the pursuit, amounts

my at about half a league distance from the field of battle, (if this attack of posts may be allowed that name) and daring the Austrians to return to the charge, but without effect. Daun refused his old scheme of acting upon the defensive. He had paid very dear, in this last affair, for hazarding an attack under the most favourable circumstances to promise him success. Having missed of his aim, where he fought with every advantage on his side, he dared not risk another battle, upon equal terms, 1758.

A. D.

M. Daun's conduct
after the battle.

known to us, among which are eight 24, and thirty-seven 12 pounders. A great quantity of ammunition and warlike implements have also fallen into our hands, and more are still bringing in, as well as artillery. We have taken upwards of 35 colours and two standards from the enemy. These undoubted proofs of victory were presented on the 18th to their Imperial and Royal Majesties by M. de Tillier.

We may compute the loss of the enemy already, is killed, wounded, and deserters, at 10,000 at least. We cannot justly tell what our loss is.

The great number of dead that covered the ground, and the cold, which began to be very severe, determined the Marshal to make the troops, already greatly fatigued, return to their old camp. His Excellency, however, left the brigade of Count Colloredo, with the companies of grenadiers and carabineers, on the field of battle, to bury the dead, and take care of the wounded. The camp, of which we made ourselves masters, was given up to be pillaged. According to the advices we have received, the enemy encamped the night after the battle at Klein Sautzen.

By a list annexed to the above relation, the Austrians make the total of their killed 3000; and of their wounded 3972, the missing not mentioned. Thus by the Austrian accounts of their loss, it exceeded that of the Prussians by some thousands, the whole loss of the latter is killed, wounded, and missing, being only 3000 men.

A. D.
1758.Council of War
held at MunichKing of Prussia's
conduct.Marches
to the relief of Neiss.

with a general and an army, rendered more vigilant and resolute by the check they had received, and eager to wipe off that imaginary disgrace of suffering an enemy, that flew from them by day, to surprize them asleep in their tents, like thieves, under the cover of the night. For, this very Daun, who boasted of his dubious victory, instead of pursuing the Prussians, or seeking to improve his pretended success in the late action, entrenched his forces up to the teeth, and fortified himself with a numerous artillery on the eminences about his camp, to secure his army from an attack, by those he vainly represented to be a vanquished enemy.

His Prussian Majesty in this situation, having no hopes to draw the Austrians to a fair engagement, and taught, by experience, the danger of attacking them in such an advantageous camp: seeing also the necessity of his immediate assistance both in Saxony, to counteract the united force of the Austrians and Imperialists, and in Silesia, already over-run by the Austrians, and upon the eve of forcing Neiss to surrender to his enemies, determined in this dilemma, not to watch the uncertain motions of M. Daun, nor to prefer the covering of Saxony, to his more important interest in Silesia, he ordered a large detachment to march under Prince Henry from Saxony, to enable him to raise the siege of Neiss, and on the 24th of October, broke up his own camp at Doherschütz, and marched to Gorlitz. However, this was not done with that secrecy, but Daun was soon

John apprized of it, and penetrated into the King's intention to Goritz was a post, which would give the party in possession a considerable advantage. The Austrian general therefore made a push to secure it before the Prussians. But they got no further than Landfried. Here a skirmish ensued with the Prussian vanguard. The Austrians were worsted and lost 800 men, by which Daun lost all the advantages gained at Hoch-Kirchen, and his advantageous encampment after that action. General Laudon was detached with 24,000 men to follow the Prussians, but with no effect. The road was entirely open from Gorlitz into Silesia, and his Prussian Majesty pursued his march without any material interruption to Nossen in the neighbourhood of Neiss; where his whole army arrived on the 6th of November.

A. D.
1758

Pursued by the Austrians.

Austrians worsted.

Neiss had been invested ever since the 4th of August, and prosecuted with the utmost vigour by the Generals Harsch and de Ville, from the 3d of October. The garrison defended it with the greatest bravery, determined not to surrender without the King's special order; who, to their great joy, advanced to their relief on the 7th of November. The Austrian General immediately raised the siege, leaving a considerable quantity of ammunition and stores behind him, and re-

The King arrives in the neighbourhood of Neiss.

Siege of Neiss raised.

32,000 cannon balls of 24 lb. wt. 23,000 ditto of 12 lb. wt. 1700 bomb shells of 75 lb. wt. 3000 ditto 30 lb. wt. 6100 ditto of 30 lb. wt. 6000 ditto of 10 and 7 lb. wt. 200,000 grenades, 500 iron crows, 1000 jacks, 500 thick planks for batteries, and 10 gunpowder magazines.

A. D.
1758.

The Austrians
pursued.

Retire
from below Coel.

M. Daun
meditates
the reduction of Saxony.

Marches
to Dresden

passed the Neisse, but not without considerable loss; for General Tottlew, the governor of Neisse, who had behaved with so much gallantry and conduct in the siege, killed out upon the fugitives, and cut between seven and ten thousand pieces.

The Austrians, who had blockaded Coel for some time, restored the trade, and made the best of their way to join the army retired from before Neisse, and these united retreated with great precipitation into Austrian Silesia and Bohemia.

Thus the main point, which was intended by M. Daun, to prevent the King of Prussia's lifting the siege of Neisse, after the action of Hohenkirchen, being rendered abortive, his next point in view was to take the advantage of his Majesty's absence, and the considerable distance of his army, to wrest Saxony out of his possession. So that having failed of securing the pass at Goerlitz, the Austrian General formed a scheme to reduce Dresden, Leipzick, and Torgau. For this purpose, he undertook Dresden with the main body of his own army: he committed the reduction of Leipzick, to the Prince de Dourponte; and Torgau, to a corps under General Haddick, on a presumption, that Prince Henry had not sufficient strength to maintain his ground.

Intent upon this plan of operations, and having no force to obstruct his march, Count Daun, on the 6th of November, passed the Elbe at Pirna, with 80,000 men, in expectation of the surrender of Dresden upon his appearance. The army of the empire had cut off Prince Henry's communication situation with Leipzig, and had also invested it. General Maderik marched with all expedition to 1758.

A.D.

Prince Henry in these straits, threw himself into the city of Dresden, and retired to the other side of the Elbe, and left General Schmettau, with 15,000 men, to defend the city, of great extent and badly fortified. The Austrian General, on the 9th, the very day his Prussian Majesty raised the siege of Neiss, convinced the governor, that his design was against the capital, and drove him to the necessity to replace the combustibles in the houses of the suburbs, which surrounded the city ditch and command the ramparts, and had been removed in the July preceding, when Daun retired from before that city, on the approach of the King of Prussia, in his return from chastising the Russians near Custrin.

Pr. Henry
retires.

Daun appears before Dresden.

The governor prepares for its defence.

The necessity of this resolution is accounted for, from the weakness of the suburbs; it being impossible for the governor to prevent the enemy's getting possession of them by a coup de main; most of the houses within the suburbs, from the gate of Pirna to the gate of Wildorf, commanding the body of the town, not only by their proximity to the ramparts, but by their prodigious height of seven and eight stories. However this was a most deplorable expedient to save the city; for these suburbs were equal to one of the finest cities in Europe, and much superior to Dresden within the walls, on account of their stately buildings, inhabitants, and various manufactures.

Reasons
for burning the suburbs.

The

A.D.
1733

The governor gives notice of this resolution.

The answer of the Saxon court.

Outguards placed.

Endeavours to prevent the ruin of the suburbs.

The governor informed the court, by Mr. de Bose, the chief cup-bearer, of his resolution; That if the enemy's army should approach the suburbs, he would that instant set fire to them. Who received for answer, That the judges of the court being tied, they were obliged to acquiesce in all circumstances; and wait the last extremities; therefore the governor might follow the motion of his own will, and do whatever he thought he could answer. Accordingly on the 8th, the enemy's advanced troops, having attacked the hussars and independent battalions, posted at Streissen and Gruene-Wiese, and the Austrians might find means, as the night drew on, to find their way pell-mell into the suburb, by repelling and pursuing the advanced posts; he first detached Colonel Itzenplitz, with 700 men and some pieces of cannon, on the 9th in the morning, to take post in the redoubts surrounding the suburbs, to support the hussars and independent battalions in case of need; and then about noon, foreseeing all his care that way would be to no purpose, he renewed his remonstrance to the magistrates of the town, that it would be absolutely incumbent upon him to set fire to the suburbs, upon the first appearance of an Austrian in them; and further told them, that this would be the last notice he should give them. But he got no other answer from them, but shrugging of shoulders, and deploring the misfortune of their fellow citizens, though the governor told them, that it was in the power of their court to avert the calamity.

While

While the governor tried these fair means to prevent a conflagration, the Austrian van-guard attacked the advanced posts, and forced the hussars and Monjou's independent battalion to quit the great garden and retire into the suburbs. They then attacked the small redoubts, forced three of them, and penetrated to Zinzendorff-house, and the draw bridge of Pirna gate, on which they left one soldier killed, and during this attack, the enemy's cannon played into the city. Yet the governor did not proceed to extremities. Though this was an open attack upon both the suburbs and the town, no house was set on fire. The cannon upon the ramparts drove the Austrians back, and before night he obliged them to quit the redoubts. In the mean time, the army under General Itzenplitz marched through the city, passed the Elbe, and encamped under the cannon of the New Town. General Meyer was charged, with the defence of the suburbs, with his independent battalions, and four others; with positive orders to set fire to them, if he found reason to proceed to that extremity, after giving notice to the inhabitants.

The preparations for an assault, by the enemy's erecting of batteries, and planting cannon in the night, and the smart fire upon those who were sent beyond the barriers to reconnoitre, being reported to the governor, and he being convinced that his strength was in no condition to prevent the Austrians making themselves masters of the suburbs, because the height of the houses obstructed the service of the cannon from the ramparts, and 1758.

A. D.

Austrians
attack the advanced posts.

Driven back by the cannon.

Austrians prepare to attack the city.

A. D.
1758.Suburbs ordered to be burnt.

and the magistrates and court not willing to interpose in such a critical juncture, he permitted General Meyer to give the signal, and at three in the morning of the 10th, the greatest part of the suburb of Pirna, the houses adjoining to the ditch, and two of the suburb of Windorn, were in flames. The six battalions, with the 700 men from the redoubts entered the town by the three gates, which were immediately barricaded; and after six in the morning, there was not a Prussian in the suburbs; notwithstanding the many falsehoods published on this occasion, by the court of Vienna, to impeach the humanity of the Prussian general: though the court of Dresden were so sensible of his humane conduct, that they thanked him for the good order he caused to be observed during these troubles.

M. Daun
remon-strates against this proceeding

M. Daun pretended to be greatly surprized at the sight of these flames, and sent Colonel Savouisky

A list of the houses burnt in the suburbs of Dresden, from the 1st of 4 to the 10th of August by the Prussians.

Houses, seven in the Kilmengert's quarter; 14 in the Ram quarter; 92 in Pirna quarter; one in Hülbe quarter; two in Seethor quarter; nine in Poppitz quarter; 25 in the bailiwick quarter; the excise house, as also the excise house and guard house at Pirna gate, and the excise and guard houses at Seethor. In all 180 houses.

Persons killed or hurt.

In Ram quarter; two aged persons burnt.

In Pirna quarter; a hougher killed by a cannon ball from the town; a girl of 14, and a widow wounded.

In Poppitz quarter; a woman killed by the independent battalion.

to Count Schmettau, the governor, to enquire, whether it was by order, that the suburbs were burnt in a royal residence, which, he said, was a thing unheard of among Christians; and that he hoped that the city of Dresden would not be treated in the same manner. The Marshal further sent his compliments to the court, and threatened the governor to be made responsible, in his person, for what he had done, and for what might be done against this royal residence.

Count Schmettau returned for answer, 'That he had the honour to be known to the Marshal; that he had orders to defend the town to the last man: that his Excellency was too well acquainted with war, to be ignorant that the destruction of the suburbs, which the Marshal had attacked, was according to rule: that if he attacked the town the governor would defend himself from house to house, and from street to street, with the infantry of the whole army; and then, if driven to the extremity, he would make his last effort in the royal palace, rather than abandon the city contrary to the command of his royal master.'

The governor's answer.

Loud were the outcries against this act of military power in a neutral city, and the residence of a sovereign Prince. The governor, Count Schmettau, exculpated himself of any act of cruelty or inhumanity, by the testimony of M. de Rose, the cup-bearer, whom his Excellency employed in all his messages on this occasion to the court: and further by a certificate of the magistrates of Dresden, and of the Judges of the suburbs of the same city;

Complained of all over Europe.

A. D.
1752.

city, in contradiction to the memorial of the Saxon minister, the Resident M. Porikau's memorial to

The letter from M. de Bose, chief cup-bearer to the court of Dresden, to Count Schmettau.

"I have the honour to acquaint your Excellency, in answer to what you wrote to me this day; I must then, that ever since you had the government of Dresden, I informed you of all that his Royal Highness charged me to tell you in his name, and I have likewise reported to his Highness, your Excellency's answers.

"As to the first point, I also remember very well, that your Excellency charged me, in the month of July, to represent to his Royal Highness, that if Marshal Daun should attack the city, you must set fire to the suburbs, particularly the houses that adjoined to the ditch; into which houses, your Excellency immediately ordered combustibles to be put. I also remember, that upon the instructions, which his Royal Highness made, by me, to your Excellency, you ordered them to be removed when Marshal Daun retired; and of this I also made an humble report.

"It is also true, that when Marshal Daun was at Lockowitz, on the 18th of November last, your Excellency charged me to acquaint his Royal Highness, in your name, that, if Marshal Daun should approach near the town, and attack it, you should be obliged to burn the suburbs, and the houses adjoining the town ditch. Although I made several remonstrances to your Excellency from the court, you declared, that you was ordered by the King your master, to defend yourself to the last extremity, and that you could not change your measures, unless Marshal Daun should be prevailed with not to attack the town. To which I answered, in his Royal Highness's name, that he knew nothing of Marshal Daun's designs; that he could not intermeddle in the operations of war, and would consequently be obliged to endure what he could not hinder.

"Lastly, it is well known, that your Excellency, during the fire, took every possible measure in the town, to prevent those

A. D. 1758. kept up by red-hot balls fired into the houses and along the streets, the whole was instantly on fire.—

That a shoemaker, endeavouring to save his infant on a pillow, from burning in the flames, was stopped by a volunteer, who snatched the babe from him, and threw it into the flames.— That a man having got his moveables loaded in a waggon, had them stopped by a Prussian soldier, who covered the waggon with pitch, and set it on fire.— That a multitude of people, of all ages, inhabitants of those populous suburbs, perished amidst the flames.— That in the Eagle inn, called also Golden-Hart, ninety perished.— That the Austrian army beheld these horrible acts with indignation and rage.— That they sent 500 carpenters into the suburbs, to endeavour to extinguish the flames, and that, acting with compassion, their general

On the 8th and 9th the Austrian army approached the town, and on the 9th, the Austrian hussars forced their way to the suburb of Vins, and to Zinsendorf.

On the 10th, at two in the morning, fire was set to the quarters at Kien, Rann, and Wilhelms, which consisted 266 houses in all, and destroyed 1000 families.

That there were therefore in all, two persons killed; a man and a woman, greatly injured the year, and a woman it was impossible to save; one killed, and two wounded.— What has been said of a waggon is false; and it is equally false that ninety persons perished at the Eagle; only four persons are all having lost their lives, were here put to sleep. Lastly, it is false, that the Austrian expedition spent its in extinguishing the fire. We were the cause of them.

We certify, that all the above is fully conformable to truth.

Dec. 4, 1758. Signed by the sen Judge of Dresden.

tried every method to prevent them." Such were the infamous methods made use of by his enemies, to stir up an animosity, and kindle a hatred against his Prussian Majesty; the greatest potentate upon earth; as they would be esteemed, in venturing on countenancing the most notorious actions, to deprive him of the affections of good men by their lies, whom they were not able to destroy by their arms.

A. D.
1756.

M. Daun, deceived in his hopes to take Dresden by a coup de main, made a shew of an intention to besiege it in form: but the news of Neiss being relieved, and of the retreat of the Austrians before the King of Prussia; and that his Majesty was returning to Saxony with his usual rapidity, and strengthened by success, he raised the siege on the 17th, three days before the King could get to Dresden: and retired, with the army of the Empire also, into Bohemia.

Siege in form begun.

M. Daun
retires.

As to the fate of Leipstick and Torgau, Count Dohna was ordered to march with 12,000 men to the relief of Torgau. The same orders were sent to General Wedel, who with a small army observed the motions of the Swedes, and being nearest to the place, threw himself into Torgau, before Haddick arrived there, and repulsed him with loss, when he made his attack. Count Dohna being come up soon after, they united and pursued the Austrians as far as Eulenburg. The fate of Haddick, and the approach of the Prussians, struck such a terror, that the Prince of Deux Ponts also raised the siege of Leipstick.

The sieges
of Leipstick and Tor-
gau raised.

A. D.
1758.

Austrians
and Imperialists retire.

Winter-quarters
how formed.

The operations of the Swedes.

Their progress.

The Austrian operations had failed then. No one advantage was gained, and there were no more attempts thought of for this year. The Marshal having got all his forces into Bohemia and Austrian Silesia, endeavoured to place them in such a manner for the winter, as to form an immense chain of troops, so as to cover the frontiers of Silesia and Saxony, and to communicate with the Imperial army, which continued the chain from thence, through Thuringia and Franconia, where this army joined the quarters of Prince de Soubize, extending westward, along the course of the Main and Lahn, to meet those of Marshal Contades, which stretched to the Rhine, and connected the chain quite to the Meuse, so as to command the whole course of the Rhine, upwards and downwards.

The Swedes, who, in the beginning of this year, seemed averse to the war against his Prussian Majesty, were encouraged to enter upon action by the absence of the Prussian troops, obliged to undertake more important services than to watch the motions of so despicable an enemy. Count Hamilton, who commanded the Swedish army, having no force to oppose him, when Dohna had marched with his troops to watch the motions of the Russians, and being reinforced with a considerable number of men, took the field, dislodged the few Prussians left in the frontier towns, recovered Swedish Pomerania, entered the Prussian territories,

See page 144. 145. Vol. III.

and

and threatened Berlin itself with plunder and devastation; for his detachments penetrated as far as Zandstuck and Fehrbellin, and within twenty-five miles of that capital.

A. D.
1758.

In this invasion the Swedes left such marks of barbarity and cruelty, that it should seem the parties of the grand confederacy against Prussia had engaged to exceed each other in acts of inhumanity. The Swedes, who, in former wars, had always maintained the character of a brave and generous enemy, debased their martial spirit with a meanness, that is the strongest indication of enmity in a sordid mind. Though their strength did now exceed the force opposed to them, at least as four to one, they did nothing but forage, pilfer, pillage, raise contributions, &c. Except setting fire to houses, they surpassed all their confederates in this manner of making war; and wherever they came, they behaved worse than Cossacks and Calmucks. For as they had no magazines formed, nor took proper measures to be supplied with provisions, they stripped every place, wherever they came, quite bare. In a great number of villages, they not only carried away the produce of the earth, the cattle and horses, which they afterwards sold to the Jews; but also, by order from their superiors, they trampled down and destroyed the seed in the ground.

Their barbarity.

General Wedel was detached from Saxony, with a body of troops, to check and repulse these cruel invaders. Wedel arrived at Berlin, with eleven thousand effective men, on the 20th of September.

A. D.
1758.

September. General Hamilton immediately retreated, at the approach of the Prussians, leaving a garrison of 1400 men in Fehrbellin, in order to stop the Prussian army in the pursuit of his main body, and with orders to defend the place to the very last extremity. Accordingly they suffered a severe cannonade, by which every house in the town was damaged; and then they disputed the ground from house to house. But the valour of the Prussian grenadiers prevailed, and the Swedes were at last driven out, having lost 500 men 14 officers killed, besides 220 private men and some officers made prisoners. During this action the Prince of Bevern, who had been released, and retired to his government at Stettin, pursued the Swedish army with a detachment, harassed their rear, and ruined a battalion of volunteers, of whom 72 were taken prisoners, and 200 were slain; which put an end to the fears of the city of Berlin, and obliged the enemy to evacuate the Prussian territories, and seek for safety once more under their own cannon of Stralsund; where they entered into winter quarters; and General Hamilton threw up his command, and resigned all his employments, rather than be laid under the odious necessity of executing orders against the innocent and helpless, without power to face an enemy in the field.

Siege of Colberg.

General Fermor, after the battle of Zorndorf, was sensible that he could not maintain his ground in Pomerania during the winter, except he could make himself master of a sea-port in that province, province, and thereby open a communication with Russia by sea. Colberg, a small sea-port on the Baltic, and very indifferently fortified, presented itself, as the most certain object for his design. With this intention 15,000 Russians were detached, who arrived before Colberg on the 3d of October, and opened their trenches in form, but with such little success, that after twenty-six days, Major Heydon, their brave governor, without any reinforcement or succours of any kind, obliged them to raise the siege. In which disgraceful manner the whole Russian army evacuated Pomerania, and sought for winter quarters beyond the Vistula.

Thus

In the night between the 26th and 27th of October, the Russians before Colberg gave two successive assaults; but in both were repulsed, with the loss of some hundred men. Every thing was prepared for a general assault on the 28th, and troops were put into barges, in order to go down the river Persante, under the cannon of the town; but advice being received that Major General Platen had defeated a Russian detachment near Griensburg, and that he was advancing by Trepow, the Russians detained the same day to raise the siege, to burn their bridge of communication upon the Persante, and retire on the other side of the river.

The garrison seized this opportunity to sally out, under Lieutenant-Colonel Schladen, and ruin the batteries, and other works that had been raised by the Russians. These, who were not yet gone far, endeavoured to cut off the detachment that sallied out; but being drawn under the cannon of the fortress, they were beat off with considerable loss. They retreated by Cossin towards Butiez, on the frontiers of Poland.

In this march they completed the ruin of the villages through which they passed, stripping the inhabitants of every 1758.

A. D.

Conclusion of the King of Prussia's campaign.

His various fortunes.

Great abilities and success.

Thus we conclude the campaign in Germany, between the King of Prussia and his most formidable enemies; a campaign, which for its variety of events, and the spirit and conduct of his Majesty, exceeds all examples. We in the beginning beheld him, with admiration, invading Moravia and investing Olmutz; and all his successes defeated by one unfortunate stroke. We saw him, with amazement, rise up victorious out of distress; penetrating into Bohemia in spite of a superior army at his heels, obliging Koninggratz to open her gates to him; marching to the Oder, routing an army of Russians three times the number of his own; returning to Saxony, and driving the Imperial and Austrian armies before him. And, though he lost his most able generals, and suffered so great a loss in his men and in his camp at Hoch-Kirchin, his Majesty found sufficient resource in his military abilities, alternately to relieve Silesia from an Austrian army, and to oblige the Austrians and Imperialists once more to evacuate Saxony; when he had to contend with armies that were each of them greatly superior to his in numbers, and commanded by generals of approved courage and known experience. Six sieges were raised; at Colberg, at Neim, at Cosel, at Dresden, at Torgau, and at Leiplich, by him or his generals; and his Prussian Majesty could not be said to have lost one inch of ground this year, thing of value, killing the cattle, and throwing into bogs the forage and grain they could not carry off; besides committing an infinite number of other disorders not less enormous; notwithstanding-notwithstanding he was attacked by so many formidable armies, in general not - successful.

A. D.
1758.

Though these are the principal actions between the belligerents in Germany, during the year 1758,
it is requisite for their illustration, to lay before the reader some particulars, which were intended to favour the enemies of Great Britain and their allies.

Measures
pursued in favour of the Austrian confederacy.

It has been frequently represented as a state invention, that religion had any share in the political views, and powerful alliances between Austria and her allies: But, if reason may be permitted to preside, where judgment is to be passed on the proceedings of the Imperial court, this year, it cannot be disputed, but that there was a settled intention to crush the three great protestant powers in Germany, by an open prostitution of the powers lodged by the Germanic constitution in the Aulic council. For, on the 31st of August the sentence of the ban of the empire was confirmed by the Aulic council (the last court of appeal from the diet of the empire) against the King of Prussia;
and, at the same time, three decrees, or mandates,
were issued against three other protestant members of the empire: the first against the King of Great Britain, as Elector of Brunswick Lunenburgh;
the second against the Duke of Brunswick Wol-fenburghe, and the third against the Count of Lippe Buckebourg. In that against his Britannic Majesty, the ban of the empire was threatened,
for having joined his troops to those of the Elector of Brandenburg, and taking into his pay the

Against
the Protestant religion.

Decree of the Aulic
council
against the three Protestant
powers.

A. D. 1758. forces of several princes, in order to support the Electors rebellion;—for having ravaged the countries of Hildesheim, Osnaburg, and Münster,— for having taken a Prussian general to ground and his troops, and with violence and arms invaded the counties of Paderborn, Juliers, Bergue, Cologne, Linge, and Brabant, taking towns, besieging cities, raising contributions, and seizing the revenues, and lastly, for bringing foreign troops into the empire, taking possession of Rimbden, and oppressing his co-estates. His Majesty, for these offences, was ordered to withdraw his foreign troops from Germany immediately, to desist from supporting the rebellion of the Elector of Brandenburgh, to disband the troops he has taken into his pay, to make good the damages he had already done, to give security for his good behaviour
for the future, and lastly, to join his contingent to the army of the empire, in order to punish,
in an exemplary manner, the rebellion that had been raised, in open violation of the Imperial decrees.

Such an attempt, in favour of France, to tie
the hands of his Britannic Majesty, Elector of Hanover, &c. from defending his Germanic dominions, and succouring his allies, from an enemy
unjustly and unprovoked attacking, plundering, burning, and laying their countries, villages, and towns desolate, required a most explicit reply from the Elector of Hanover, and accordingly Baron Gemminger, electoral minister of Brunswick Launenburgh, presented a memorial to the diet of the empire,

Memorandum
presented to the diet of the empire
the 10th of August 1758.

Decree of
the Aulic Council
bearing the date of the 10th of August

HIS BRITANNIC Majesty,
Elector of Hanover's
reply.

empire, in which he sufficiently exposed the only quest of the mandate of the Aulic council; and the ingratitude of the Emperor and Empress Queen,
 which could endeavour to ingratiate an reward
 the services done by his Majesty to the House of Austria, as follows: His Britannic Majesty during the one and thirty years of his glorious reign, has observed so irreproachable a conduct towards all his co-states of the Empire, without distinction of religion, that no Prince of the empire hath received greater proofs of esteem and confidence than he can produce. His Majesty hath, as much as the weakest states, always observed right and justice. On the death of the Emperor Charles VI. he beheld the time, which will be a memorable era in the history of the House of Austria, when the crown of France poured numerous armies into the empire, to extirpate that house, and make itself master of Germany. His Majesty, in his double capacity, of King and Elector, placed himself in the breach;
 he led in person the auxiliary army of her Majesty the Empress Queen, the greatest part of which was composed of his own troops: at the battle of Dettingen he exposed his sacred person for that Princes; and his Royal Highness, the Duke of Cumberland, his son, still bears the scars of wounds
 there received.

The year 1745, when his present Imperial Majesty was chosen Emperor, is still recent in the memory of all the states of the empire, as well as the pains, which his Britannic Majesty took upon

At DA
 1758

His Britannic Majesty, Elector of Hanover's
 memorial to the diet
 of the empire.

A. D. 1758. upon that occasion. He purchased the preservation of the House of Austria, which was effected by the peace of Aix-la-Chapelle, with the blood and treasure of his subjects, and by means of the most important conquests of his crown. He hath endeavoured to maintain the imperial crown in that House, by negotiations for the election of a King of the Romans. The treaty of succession concluded with the Duke of Modena, and the aggrandisement resulting from it to the House of Austria, were owing to his Majesty's friendship.

After setting forth the gratitude of the House of Austria, it proceeds thus:

"His Majesty, as Elector, is charged, first, With not conforming to the resolutions taken the 17th of January, and 9th of May, last year, but, on the contrary, refusing his concurrence, and declaring for a neutrality: secondly, With giving succours, aid, and assistance, to his Majesty the King of Prussia, entering into an alliance with that Prince, joining his troops to those of Prussia, under the command of a general in the service of his Prussian Majesty, of sending English troops into Germany, and making them take possession of the city of Embden, and employing the auxiliary troops of some other states of the empire: and, thirdly, It is complained, that contributions have been exacted, in his Majesty's name, of divers states of the empire."

With regard to the first charge, it is very true, that, in the deliberations of the diet of the empire, the beginning of last year, it was given as his Majesty's

A.D.
1758.

Majesty's opinion, as well as that of most of his protestant co-estates, that the present troubles should be amicably terminated. His Majesty, in giving his opinion, had, as usual, no other view than what equity and the good of the Germanic empire seemed to him to require. Whatever judgment shall be formed of the unhappy war that hath broke out, the public will always remember, that by a bare declaration of her Majesty the Empress-Queen, "That she would not attack his Prussian Majesty," the rupture would have been avoided, and the effusion of much blood, as well as the desolation of Germany, prevented. The states that have suffered by the calamities of the war, may judge whether the way that was taken, was the shortest for the re-establishment of peace, so much to be desired; and whether it were not to be wished, that, laying aside all private views, his Britannic Majesty's proposal had been followed.

It is true, his Majesty took no part in the resolutions, which were contrary to his sentiments. But the laws of the empire have not thereby received the least infringement. The question, whether in materia collegiorum, the majority be sufficient, has been referred ad comitia imperii, by the instrumentum P. W. Art. v. § 52. and is yet undecided. It is not by the plurality of voices, that it can be there determined, but only by means of an amicable accommodation; since otherwise that reference would have been a very useless contrivance; and it was well known, at the negotiations negotiations for the peace of Westphalia, what was the tendency of the opinion of the Catholic states, which formed the majority; those very states, and all the other members of the empire, ought however to consider well, whether it be their essential interest to acknowledge, in the present case, that every state of the empire is obliged to submit to the majority of votes, in matters of content, as in the present case; which the principal Catholic Electors have in other cases denied; and which will certainly be retorted upon them in proper time.

A. D.
1756.

But whatever principles shall be assumed, with regard to this question, nothing is more evident, than that, considering circumstances and the situation of the affair then and now in question, his Majesty could never be required to give his troops to comply with those resolutions of the empire. All Germany knows, though the decree of the Aulic Imperial council says not a word about it, that at the very time when those resolutions were taken, his Majesty's Electoral dominions were most unjustly threatened with an invasion by France. In the month of March, that year, the court of Vienna signed a convention with France, by virtue of which the enemy was to pass the Weser in the month of July, and enter the King's territories. This invasion was made accordingly. The Empress-Queen joined her own troops to those of France, and, in return, stipulated by solemn treaties signed before-hand, to have half of the contributions that should be exacted.

acted. The damage which the King's subjects suffered by this first invasion, exclusive of the sums which the provinces were to furnish (and which have been paid out of the royal demesnes) amounted to several millions. And still the unjust rage of his Majesty's enemies was not exhausted. The French army, which entered on another side, under the command of the Prince de Soubise, in company with the troops of Wurtemberg, which the reigning Duke, a thing of which there is no example, led himself, under a French general, against a co-estate, hath again invaded, for the second time, his Majesty's dominions and those of his allies; exacted insupportable contributions; carried off the King's officers, entirely foraged the country, and plundered several places, and committed the greatest disorders, whilst the court of Vienna boasts of having ordered this invasion (the sole end of which was to ravage the King's dominions and those of Hesse) as an effect of its magnanimity, and as a merit with the Germanic body.

If, in such circumstances, his Majesty should be required to suspend the preparations he has begun, and join the troops that he wants for his own defence, to those which, from the arbitrary views of the court of Vienna, are led against his Prussian Majesty, by a Prince who doth not belong to the generality of the Empire; (and on whom the command hath been conferred, without a previous assembly of the Germanic body; the right of the states of the Empire to defend themselves,

A. D.
1734.

themselves, when such defence squares not with the views of the Imperial court, ought at the same time to be settled. It is hoped that things are not yet come to this pass in Germany. Self-defence is the most urgent duty. The resolutions of the Empire cannot deprive the meanest man, much less a free state, and an Elector of the empire, of this right; nor require him to join the troops, he wants for that end, to those, which, jointly with the troops of France, have invaded his country, and shared in the contributions there extorted.

In the second place, his Majesty doth not deny that he hath entered into an alliance with the King of Prussia, which is entirely conformable to the rules of right: But as he is accountable to God alone for what he doth as King, on the other hand, in the report made of what he has done as Elector, the dates which preceded, have been confounded with those that followed the French invasion. From the beginning of last year his Majesty took every method to shew, that the only thing he aimed at, without taking part, otherwise, in the war, was to oppose the French foreign troops, knowing that they were sent only to invade his Electoracy as indeed they have employed themselves almost wholly in ruining estates comprehended under the guaranty of the empire, as well those of the Duke of Saxony of the Ernestine line, of the Duke of Brunswick Wolfenbute, the Landgrave of Hesse Cassel, and the Count of Lippe-Schaumbourg, as those of his Majesty.

Majesty. This just intention, founded on the laws, from which his Majesty hath been so far from departing in the smallest matter, that no instance thereof hath been, or can be brought,
 did not, nevertheless, hinder the French troops,
 who were furnished with the Emperor's lettres re- quisitoriales, from entering Germany in the avowed quality of auxiliary troops to the Empress-Queen, in company with those of the House of Austria and the Elector Palatine. The Empire hath already been informed, on the 3d of December, last year, of the first proposals made, both to the Imperial court, and the court of France, for an amicable determination of differences; proposals, which could not have been rejected, had not an hostile attack been resolved on. These offers, which, from the manner in which they were received, his Majesty hath reason to regret that he ever made, leave no shadow of plausibility to the reproaches that may be made on account of the engagement that ensued, in whatever light the King of Prussia's case may be considered. His Majesty is, indeed, fully persuaded, that he might,
 at any time, have entered into an alliance with that Prince for their common defence; but no one can doubt, that in this urgent necessity, when he was left alone, he had a right to seek assistance where it could be got. No fault can possibly be found with that which the King of Prussia gave him, in delivering the Electoral states of Brunswick, and those of Wolfenbützel, Hesse and Buchebourg. The very nature of this deliverance,

2000

ing, and being informed by your Majesty's instructed Council, that your Majesty's grace to his most Serene Highness Duke Ernest August of Brunswick-Lüneburg, (who hath since commanded the King's army) and Prince George, and a glory, which is the greatest, the more terrible,
it is for that Prince to have delivered from such heavy and unjust oppressions, the Dominion of a King, from whose family he is descended, and principalities in which he drew his first breath,
where his ancestors have reigned, and where the Duke his brother still reigns. It is with an equally just right that this Duke, with the Duke of Saxe-Gotha, the Landgrave of Hesse-Cassel and the Count of Schaumbourg Lippe, put their troops into his Majesty's pay. Posterity will hardly believe, that at a time when Austrian, Palatine and Württemberg auxiliaries were employed to invade the countries belonging to states of the Empire, other members of the Germanic body, who employed auxiliaries in their defence, were threatened with the ban. His Majesty ordered the English troops to be sent over, and possession
to be taken of Embden, in his quality of King;
and hath no occasion to give account thereof to any. Mean while the laws of the Empire permit the states thereof to make use of foreign troops in their own defence; they forbid only the introduction of them into the empire to invade the dominions of another, as the Emperor Charles had done, and also of Wolfenbütel, and also of Celle. The very name of this dominion

B

Vol. III

In the first and last place, his Majesty the King of Great Britain, Elector of Brunswick-Lüneburg, sent ministers particularly to the Palatine court, and that of Cologne, to divert them from joining in the designs of France against his Dominions. It cannot therefore be doubted that it would have been highly agreeable to him, if those courts had taken measures, that would have freed him from the burden of the war. But none can expect that his Majesty should, with indifference, see himself treated as an enemy by his co-estates. The Elector of Cologne, and the Bishop of Liege, had no troops that were wanted in the French army: But, in consideration of subsidies, opened to it the gates of their towns, and gave it all the assistance in their power, without which that army could not, at that time, have proceeded so far as the Electoral estates, where the Austrian and Palatine troops behaved much worse than the French themselves. How can it be expected that his Majesty, after God hath blessed his arms with success, should not resent this treatment; The laws of the Empire forbid the attacking of the estates of the Empire: but they permit defence against, and the pursuit of those, who, by their invasion, have violated the public peace.

If the crown of France be free to ravage the dominions of the Duke of Brunswick, and the Landgrave of Hesse Cassel, because they have given the King auxiliary troops: if the Empress Queen may, for the assistance she hath lent the French King to attack the King's dominions, ap-

THE GENERAL HISTORY OF

Resolution
of the Evangelic
body.

proper to bestow half of the contributions raised there. His Majesty ought to be equally permitted to make those states, who have favoured the unjust enterprises of his enemies, feel the burden of the war.

Such is the tenor of the famous memorial which the Hanoverian minister presented to the diet of the Empire, and which made so strong an impression upon many of the members, that on the 29th of November, the Evangelic body published a conclusum, purporting, That with respect to the ban of the Empire, with which several Princes were now threatened, they would never consent to any innovation that shall be proposed, contrary to the 20th article of the capitulation, which the Emperor confirmed by oath at his election;
and that whatever shall be done, contrary to that,
shall be looked upon by them as null and void,
and shall be treated accordingly.

The Saxon
memorial concerning Dresden.

Another attempt was made in the diet of the Empire, to spirit up a detestation of the King of Prussia's method of proceeding in Saxony. The complaint was founded upon the measures taken by his governor for the defence of the city of Dresden, against M. Daun's army. In which memorial M. Ponickau, the Saxon minister at the diet, was taught to represent that affair in the most tragical view; affirming, That soldiers had been dispersed and stationed in the suburbs, by the orders of Count Schmettau, to break open houses and shops, to set fire to combustibles, to add fresh fuel, and then to close up the doors;

that he kept up the fire by red-hot balls fired into the houses, &c. that the inhabitants were left without cover, and destroyed by the cannon and small arms; and that such as escaped were murdered by the bayonets of the Prussian soldiers, posted in the streets for that purpose: he even enumerated several particular instances, in confirmation of this inhuman representation; and concluded with the number of houses, which were burnt on this occasion.

A. D.
1759.

However, this failed. Baron Plotho, the Brandenburg minister, refuted every article of this Saxon memorial, by most authentic certificates, as we have already shewn. His Prussian Majesty, no doubt, was greatly misrepresented on this particular occasion; it is to be wished his whole conduct towards Saxony had been as irreprehensible. For at his first seizing upon that Electorate, it was pretended to be no more than a cautionary expedient to prevent his confederate enemies taking any advantages against him on that side. And when he disarmed the Saxon forces, it was under the same caution, that they should not join his enemies. But he was no sooner in full possession of Saxony, and her troops disarmed, than he acted like an enemy; extorted heavy contributions, under pain of military execution, and forced the Saxons to furnish him with a great number of recruits; he discharged the government in the state, and applied the public reve-

Refuted.

Observations on the King of Prussia's conduct towards Saxony.

See these particulars on page 367, 368. Vol. III.

See page 191. Vol. I.

THE GENERAL HISTORY OF

A. D.
1758.

nues in his own life, yet, always considering that he did nothing but for the safety and common benefit of the Electorate and its Subjects. However, since the French King had shown him an example, by establishing his administration in Hanover, which entirely changed the government and system of that Electorate, and also by his late decree for the administration of the Landgraviate of Hesse; and the Russians had ill-treated the kingdom of Prussia: and alleging the necessity to which he was driven to take such a resolution, by the hostilities repeated, in that Electorate, against him by the Austrians and Imperialists: the Prussian directory of war, on the 2d of December, 1758, sent a decree to the deputies of the estates of Saxony, which, after having enjoined them to deliver a certain quantity of flour and forage, signified in express terms,—" Though the King of Prussia had hitherto treated the Electorate of Saxony as a country he had taken under his special protection, that the face of affairs was now changed in such a manner, that his Majesty would consider it, for the future, only as a conquered country, out of which he had driven his enemies by force of arms." In pursuance of this declaration, all the revenues of the Saxon ministers were sequestered:— And as the Russians had seized in Prussia all the rents of the estates in that country, belonging to the Prussian officers, the same was done by the King of Prussia, in regard to the estates of Saxon officers in the Russian service. Twenty persons were ordered

Declares it to be a conquered country.

Seizes upon the revenues, government, &c.

brought

B p 3

ordered to depart for Warsaw in 24 hours, and the papers of the privy councillors were sealed up, and the administration of the government was committed entirely to Prussians.

A. D. 1758.

Did it consist with truth, they that are in love with his Prussian Majesty's heroic qualities, would be pained to see a veil drawn over the miseries of Saxony, which can be imputed to none but him. Instead of comforting means to make a country happy, to which he now laid a claim by right of conquest, and which had been impoverished by former exactions, and very lately punished with military execution, he rather seemed to seize on it as a prey to be pulled to pieces. Fresh contributions were demanded, and extorted by most inhuman severities, severities, that have extended to distant nations; and whose effects are now felt most heavily by the merchants in the greatest trading towns in that quarter of Europe. For, his Majesty carried off the merchants from the exchange by soldiers, and confined them in a more wretched condition than felons, on straw beds, &c. till they were obliged to draw bills for very large sums on their foreign correspondents; which bills are supposed the original of the late bankruptcies made at Amsterdam, Hamburg, Bremen, &c. How far this was just, or justifiable by the laws of arms, is not a question to be decided here: but that it was a most severe scourge upon an innocent and blameless people, every one must agree. Nevertheless, it is far from bearing the cruel aspect and ruinous consequences of the total desolation

His conduct unjustifiable.

His measures the origin of the present bankruptcies.

The Austrian allies more cruel and ruinous consequences of the total desolation

1758
1758

THE GENERAL HISTORY OF

A.D.
1758

brought upon all conditions, without distinction of age or sex, by the confederates against him and the allies of Great Britain, as we have related in the marches of Russians, French, and Swedes, in Pomerania, Westphalia, Hesse, and Hanover; where the ruin of their lands, houses, public edifices, manufactures and estates, cannot possibly be repaired in less than half a century.

Conduct of the Dutch

The Dutch, availing themselves of their neutrality in this war, pretended a right, by treaties with England, to trade with those people and countries with whom we are in actual war, and to cover their property, in Dutch ships, from the power of the English. So that the French navigation being entirely ruined by our naval superiority,

Trade for our enemies.

these neutral neighbours took upon them not only to carry the produce and manufactures of our enemies to market, but also to supply them with every thing necessary for carrying on a war by sea and land.

Observations on this conduct.

Such a glaring instance of perfidy, thus supported our enemies in the most essential manner, to carry on their trade, and to continue the war, could not be suffered to reign long. Our men of war and letters of marque brought Dutchmen continually into port laden with an illicit cargo; and they that were found with contraband goods, or with French property on board, were condemned in our court of admiralty by due course of law.

The French had no ships left, and their court

See page 41, Vol. II.

directed

ordered or permitted the governors of their islands and colonies to licence such Dutch ships as would undertake to carry their produce and manufactures, and to supply them with every thing they should want. The Dutch, sensible of the sweets arising from this lucrative navigation, ran all risks. The French ports, both in Europe and America, were thronged with Hollanders: and the advantages they received from thence so blinded their understandings, that they, at last, claimed a right by treaty, to aid and assist our enemies: and a resolution of the States General stigmatized the captures of Dutch ships, made under those circumstances, by the name of robberies or piracies, pursuant to a memorial presented to their High Mightinesses, and signed by 269 merchants, &c. The directors of the Amsterdam company applied

A. D.
1772.
871

Complain
of the English
for taking their ships.

We the undersigned merchants, insurers, and others, concerned in the commerce and navigation of the state, most humbly represent, That the violences and unjust depredations committed by English men of war and privateers on the vessels and effects of the subjects of the state, are not only continued, but daily multiplied: and cruelty and excesses carried to such a height, that the petitioners are forced to implore the assistance of your High Mightinesses, that the commerce and navigation of the republic, which are the two sinews of the state, may suffer no interruption, and be protected in the most efficacious manner, in order that the being of the State may be preserved, and that it may be kept from complete and final ruin.

The petitioners shall not insert here a long recital of their ships that have been illegally stopped and seized, nor of the piracies and violences that have been committed for a considerable space of time, on the subjects of the republic; nor o

AD-1 applied to the State for the Citizenship of School
 1961 regulations of the State were effective in Min

[illegible]

13 Nor will the petitioners enlarge on the injury offered to the 14 Dutch flag, in contempt of your High Mightinesses, the nat-15 ural protectors of the numbers of the Republic. There lies the 16 17
18 19 20 21
22
23 24
25
26
27 28 29 30 31 32 33 34 35
36 37
38
39 40
41 42
43 44
45
46
47 48
49
50 51
52
53
54
55
56 57 58 59 60
61
62
63
64
65
66
67
68
69
70 71
72
73
74
75 76
77
78
79 80
81
82 83
84
85
86 87
88 89
90
91 92
93
94
95
96
97
98
99 100
101
102
103
104
105
106
107
108
109
110
111
112
113
114
115
116
117
118
119
120
121 122
123
124
125
126
127 128
129
130
131
132
133
134
135
136
137
138
139
140
141 142
143
144
145
146
147
148
149
150 151 152
153
154 155 156
157
158
159
160
161
162
163
164
165
166
167
168 169
170
171
172 173
174 175
176
177
178
179
180
181
182
183
184
185
186
187
188
189
190
191
192
193
194 195
196
197
198
199 200 201
202
203
204
205
206 207
208
209
210
211
212 213 214
215
216
217
218
219
220
221
222
223
224
225
226
227
228
229
230
231
232
233 234
235
236
237 238 239
240
241
242
243
244
245
246
247
248
249
250 251
252
253 254
255
256
257
258
259
260
261
262
263
264
265
266
267
268 269
270
271
272
273 274
275
276
277
278
279
280
281
282
283 284
285
286
287
288
289
290
291
292
293
294 295 296
297
298
299
300
301
302
303
304
305
306
307
308 309
310
311
312
313
314 315
316
317
318
319
320
321 322
323
324 325
326
327
328
329
330
331
332
333
334
335
336
337
338
339 340
341
342
343
344 345
346 347
348 349
350 351
352
353
354
355
356
357
358
359 360
361
362
363
364 365
366
367
368
369
370
371
372
373 374
375
376
377
378
379
380
381
382
383
384
385
386
387
388
389
390
391
392
393
394
395
396
397
398
399
400
401
402
403
404
405
406
407
408
409 410
411 412
413
414
415
416
417
418
419
420
421
422
423
424
425
426 427
428
429
430 431
432
433
434
435
436
437
438
439
440
441
442
443
444
445
446
447
448
449
450
451
452
453 454
455
456
457
458
459
460
461 462
463
464
465
466
467
468 469
470
471
472
473
474
475
476
477
478
479
480
481
482
483
484
485
486
487
488
489
490
491
492
493
494
495
496
497
498
499 500 501 502
503
504
505
506
507
508
509
510
511
512
513
514
515
516
517
518
519
520
521 522
523
524
525
526
527
528
529
530 531
532
533
534 535
536
537
538
539
540
541
542
543 544
545
546
547
548 549
550
551 552
553
554
555
556 557
558 559
560
561
562
563
564
565
566
567
568 569
570
571
572 573 574
575
576
577
578
579
580 581
582
583
584
585
586
587
588
589
590
591
592
593
594
595
596
597
598
599
600
601
602
603
604
605
606
607
608
609
610
611
612
613
614
615
616
617
618 619
620
621 622
623
624
625
626 627
628
629
630
631
632
633 634
635
636
637
638
639
640
641
642
643
644
645
646
647
648
649
650
651
652
653
654
655
656
657 658
659
660 661
662
663
664 665
666
667
668
669
670
671
672
673
674
675
676
677
678
679
680
681
682
683
684
685
686
687
688 689
690
691
692
693
694
695
696
697
698
699
700
701
702
703
704
705
706
707
708
709 710
711
712
713
714
715
716
717
718
719
720
721
722
723
724 725
726
727
728
729
730 731
732
733 734
735
736 737 738
739
740
741 742
743
744 745 746
747 748
749
750
751
752
753
754
755
756
757
758
759
760
761
762
763 764
765
766
767
768
769
770
771
772
773
774
775
776
777
778
779
780
781
782
783
784
785 786
787
788
789
790 791
792 793
794 795
796
797 798
799 800
801
802
803
804 805 806
807
808
809
810
811
812
813
814
815
816
817
818
819
820 821
822 823
824
825
826
827
828 829
830
831
832
833 834
835
836
837
838
839
840

But the petitioners beg leave to represent, with all the confidence, that they cannot forbear to lay their just complaints before your High Mightinesses, who are the protectors of their persons, their estates, their commerce, and navigation; and to lay before you the indispensable necessity of putting a stop, as soon as possible, to these depredations and violence. The petitioners offer to contribute each his contingent, and do now, at their own charge, for the support and protection of their commerce and navigation.

The petitioners state themselves, that their wife, and the risk, to which their efforts are exposed on the seat, will have their proper influence on the general body of the State, and the traders of this country, finding themselves left to the discretion of a part of that nation, with whom the State is most intimately connected, thousands of tradesmen and others, who are connected with merchants, that have hitherto carried on a flourishing trade, will be reduced to distress and poverty, their connections ceasing by the extinction of the estates of merchants, who have always approved themselves faithful to their country, these will be forced to abandon it, to their great regret, and seek shelter and protection all where which will give a mortal blow to the principal members of the community.

For these just causes, the petitioners have recourse to your High Mightinesses, most humbly imploring, both in their own names, and in the name of a multitude of unhappy people, who

Yorke, the British minister plenipotentiary at the Hague, and the merchants petitioned the Prince of Regent no less than four times for redress against these piracies and violences of the English, as they called the captures of their ships. But all their blustering and pretensions availed nothing.

The English continued to take and to condemn their own traders. Mr. Yorke also declared to their High Mightinesses, That he was authorized to say, "His Majesty was determined not

"to suffer the trade of the French colonies in "America to be carried on by the subjects of "other powers, under the specious pretext of a

"neutrality, or words to be interpreted as a li-

"cence to carry on a trade with his enemies,

"which, though not particularly specified in the

"articles as contraband, was nevertheless ren"dered such in all respects, and in every sense, by

"circumstances. That as long as the licit com"merce of the subjects of their High Mighti-

"nesses, to which his Majesty never intended to "give the least interruption, was confounded with

"this commerce, which his Majesty regarded as

"wholly illicit, all their representations would be

"fruitless." About the same time, the conduct of who are on the point of being stripped of all their effects, of sinking into the utmost distress, and being reduced to beggary, that it may please your High Mightinesses to grant to commerce and navigation such speedy, vigorous, and effectual protection, that the faithful subjects of this free State may enjoy their possessions in full security. And your petition, &c."

A. D. A 1755 and used but short

- in which about

His Britannic Majesty's resolute answer.

the

AD 1753.

Their case stated, and claim refuted.

the government of Great Britain, with respect to neutral nations, was published at London, fairly stating and refuting the claim of the Dutch to protect French property: and as the Dutch persisted in their claim, this pamphlet was published. This pamphlet has irrefragably proved, that no neutral nation has a right to support France against us, by protecting her property on board their vessels.

§. 1. The right of a neutral power to protect the property of an enemy is not derived from the law of nations, but from the principles of natural law, which are relative to the conduct of nations, or from some express treaty, by which communities, for their mutual benefit, have established some rights between them, which are not included in the law of nations.

§. 2. Nations can have no other rights than such as men originally enjoyed, as individuals, and that now one nation is to another, as one man was to another, before they entered into society.

§. 3. An individual, in a state of nature, would have had an undoubted right to protect his own person and property; but he would not have had a right to protect the person and property of A, the enemy of B, against B, supposing him to be in a state of friendship both with A and B; for how, as a friend to B, can he protect A against him? The protection of A against B is a declaration, that the protector is B's enemy, and from the moment the protector becomes an enemy, he is no longer a neutral power. This therefore, is the law between nation and nation.

§. 4. But a nation has a right, to which an individual, in a state of nature, has no pretence; the right of dominion. By the right of dominion a nation enacts laws, and establishes jurisdictions, to which, not only its own subjects, but those of other countries, are obliged to submit, within the pale of its power; here then the trial, which the law of nations gives, is, as it were, superseded, and hence arises the right which governments have always enjoyed, of protecting the property of an enemy within their own precincts.

insisted in their claims, and were refused to continue which illiterate at all hazards, our ships of war

and

and

and

and

and

and

and

and

and

and

and

and

and

and

and

and

and

and

and

and

and

and

and

and

THE GENERAL HISTORY OF

Loss of French
ships this year.

and to be picked up as soon as the ships return as declared essential: for, by the loss of ships

§ 10. That we might prevent the enemy's goods from being unduly given by their vessels, in default of some other provision, it is one of the articles, that in treaty, and in every article, in which the goods of the enemy should be considered as a spoil, and consequently, as a spoils. To establish a right, therefore, of carrying the goods of the enemy, it was necessary to have a treaty made, and it is accordingly, expressly contained in two treat-ties, that contain the article just quoted before, which alone would prove, that the two articles were inserted for different purposes.

§ 11. The right of carrying freely the goods of an enemy is expressly granted in an article in a maritime treaty between Great Britain and Holland, dated December 2, 1674, and in another between Great Britain and France, dated February 24, 1677. The article is this: "All which shall be found on board the vessels belonging to the subjects of those countries shall be accounted clear and free, although the whole loading, or any part of it, shall belong to the enemies of Great Brittain," and so reciprocally.

§ 12. It is acknowledged, that by this article the right now claimed by the Dutch, of carrying French goods, was fully granted.

§ 13. But treaties of alliance are nothing more than stipulations of mutual advantages between two communities, and ought therefore to be considered as a bargain, the conditions of which are always supposed to be equal, by those who make it.

§ 14. He therefore who breaks his part of the contract, destroys the equality or justice of it, and forfeits all those benefits, which the other party has stipulated in his favour. Of this opinion are Grotius and Puffendorf.

§ 15. Holland has broken her part of her contract with Britain in the following particulars. In a treaty between Holland

ships taken from the French in the course of this year, it appears, that the neutral ships, of which the Loss of French

ships this
year.

land and sea, concluded the 10 of March, 1713, the stipulations are, 1st, A mutual guaranty of all they already enjoyed, and might hereafter acquire by treaties of peace in Europe only; 2d, A mutual guaranty of all treaties that were then made, or might afterwards be lawfully made with any other power; 3d, A mutual promise to defend and preserve each other in the possession of all towns and fortresses, which did then, or should afterwards, belong to either of them. And, for this purpose, it is determined, that when either nation should be violated, the other shall immediately succour it with a certain number of troops and men of war, and shall be obliged to break with the aggressor within two months after the party that is already at war shall require it, and that they shall then act conjointly with all their forces, to bring the common enemy to a reasonable accommodation. Now, Minorca, a possession of the crown of Great Britain, in Europe, which she acquired by treaty, had been attacked, which is a case in the 1st guaranty. By this attack of Minorca, a treaty that was made conjointly with Holland, the treaty of Utrecht, has been broken, which is a case in the 2d guaranty, and England had been deprived of a possession, which of right belonged to her, which is a case of the 3d guaranty. Yet Holland hath not yet granted the succours stipulated; and many more than two months have passed, without her having entered into war conjointly with England, as the treaty requires. The treaty stipulates, that war shall be entered into by the party not already at war, after two months, if the party already at war requires it. If we have not required the Dutch to enter into our war with France, the Dutch have not violated this stipulation.

§. 10. By a treaty between England and Holland, signed at the Hague, the 4th of January 1717, there is a mutual stipulation of the parties to protect each other in the possession of their dominions in Europe only, as established by the treaty of Utrecht,

At D
1744

Life of French Capt. the
year.

the Dutch made by far the greatest prize. Exceeded the French ships taken at sea both in number and value.

Utrecht, by the same success, as in the former treaty, 12. In imposition of good offices, 13. In a certain number of officers, and lastly, a declaration of war. This treaty was renewed by the reciprocal alliance of 1718, again by the accession of Holland to the treaty of Hanover in 1726, and lastly, by the 2d article of the treaty of Aix-la-Chapelle. The guarantee of these treaties have been broken by Holland, as she has neither granted the stipulated succours, nor declared war against France upon our loss of Minorca.

§. 17. But it is said, that as the treaties, in which these stipulations are made, are defensive treaties, the stipulations of Holland are not binding, if we were not first attacked. To this it is answered, that though these treaties are called defensive, it does not thereby follow, that they do not operate, except we were attacked first. They guarantee in general certain rights and possessions of both parties, and when they declare what shall be done, in case either should be attacked, all interest in these parts which are the objects of the guarantee, it is not mentioned as necessary, that this should be the first attack.

§. 18. The evidence of facts, however, will prove, that England was first attacked in the present war: and therefore the treaties are binding, as defensive treaties in the strict sense. In America the present war has been little more than a continuation of the last: repeated usurpations of the possessions of Great Britain have been there the constant employment of France, almost from the hour in which the treaty of Aix was signed; and these were at last followed by an avowed military attack upon a fort belonging to the crown of Great Britain, by regular troops acting under a commission from the court of France. [In 1754, the French took the block-house and truck-house of the Virginians, at Log's town, on the Ohio; cut off all the traders but two, and carried off goods and merchandise to the value of 20,000 l.] France is also the aggressor in the European war; if the intention alone be regarded,

value. The French lost 12 men of war, 1200 hoissances and several merchantmen, which carried

30147

619 guns,

garded, the first hostile intencion in Europe was the design to invade Great Britain; a design sufficiently proved and avowed by the preparations which France made for it. If we look for the first overt act, the first overt act was also made by France in her attack upon Minorca, which was, in the opinion of all parties, the opening of the European war; for the captures that we made of the French vessels at sea, must be considered as belonging to the American war; they were made in consequence of the hostilities there first commenced, and as reprisals for the injury committed there upon the property of the English. Upon this principle the legislature here hath expressly refused to distribute the captures among the captors, though they have distributed all other prizes.

§. 12. But it may still be objected, that though France was the aggressor in America, Holland is not concerned in the quarrel, because the contested rights there are not contained in the guaranties; and though France is aggressor in Europe also, yet she being aggressor in Europe, only in consequence of hostilities committed in America, neither is Holland concerned in this. It is answered, that if the reasoning on which these objections are founded was admitted, it would alone be sufficient to destroy the effects of every guaranty, and totally extinguish the confidence which nations mutually place in each other, on the faith of defensive alliances. It points out to the enemy a certain method of avoiding the inconvenience of such an alliance; for he need only make the first effort on some place not included in the guaranty, and he may then pursue his views against every object of it with safety: Let France first attack a little spot belonging to Holland in America, and her barrier would be guarantied no longer. The opinion of Holland, upon this question, is manifest from facts. Soon after Holland had concluded a defensive treaty with France, in 1662, (of which her treaty with England is 1678, is but a copy) she became engaged in a war with England. The first attack

A. D. 619 guns, and 3824 men; 104 trading vessels, 1792 most of them coasters, of no considerable value;
 but

attack was then, as in the present case, made on a place out of Europe, on the coast of Guinea: the cause of the war was all the same, a disputed right to certain possessions out of the bounds of Europe, some in Africa, and others in the East-Indies. Hostilities having continued some time in these parts, they afterwards commenced in Europe. Holland immediately declared, that the case of that guaranty did exist, and demanded the stipulated succours. These succours were granted, and France, by this concession, shewed that she was of the same opinion, especially as it was not her interest to comply, for this very concession checked her youthful monarch in the first essay of his ambition, delayed for several months his entrance into the Spanish provinces, and brought upon him the enmity of England. That the same was intended by the treaty with us of 1678, as was intended by this treaty, farther appears from their having been negociated by the same statesman, Van Beuningen, who claimed and obtained the succours from France, in consequence of the first treaty, before he negociated the second.

§. 20. But at once to put an end to all disputes arising from the article supposed to give Holland a right of protecting French property, it was, by an article in a subsequent treaty, long ago REPEALED. The treaty, in which this article was last inserted, was concluded December 1, 1674; four years after this, a defensive alliance was concluded, in which it was stipulated between England and Holland, that, "if either party should be attacked in Europe, the other should declare war against the aggressor in two months, if required," as has been before remarked. By this article, therefore, Holland must, within two months after England has been attacked by France in Europe, become the ENEMY of France herself. Except, therefore, it can be supposed, that to be the enemy of France means to preserve her trade, and protect her property, Holland can now have no right to do either; and if she

but there are found 176 neutral ships, most of them richly laden with the produce of the French colonies, or with stores of all sorts to enable the French to continue the war. The loss of ships on the part of Great Britain amounts to 313, amongst which are found no more than seven privateers; the rest are chiefly coasting vessels, empty transports, and disarmed ships of no considerable value. A circumstance greatly in favour of the administration, which had disabled the French navy so, as to secure our trade and navigation, as well as our colonies; and took such measures, as in a little time would put an end to their scheme of a petit guerre, or a war carried on by privateers; and to their commerce in Dutch or neutral bottoms.

A. D. 1752.

What number of Dutch ships amongst them.

Loss of English ships.

Our ministry, at this time, had not the strength, but the policy of France to encounter. The French ministry had these points in view, which must be attained, or they must be undone. Trade must be supported, or their finances must fail: their colonies must be protected, or their trade must be the word any is not thus absurdly taken, the article requiring the Dutch to become the enemy of France, is a direct and positive declaration, that the ships of Holland shall not have a right to protect the effects of the French.

The policy of the French ministry.

An article of the same purport occurs in two subsequent treaties, in which it is also expressly declared, that whatever has been established by any late treaty, shall be understood and performed in the sense therein expressed, without any regard had to any former treaty.

¹ See the note on p. 48. Vol. II. and p. 33. Vol. III.

A. D.
1758.

Means
used by the French to succour
their colonies.

How obviated by the English.

lost. And in regard to Great Britain, means must be contrived to interrupt their commerce, and to injure their credit. For these purposes every stratagem was contrived and executed. The desperate state of their colonies in North America, which they could not succour by open force, put them upon the necessity of risking single ships, or small convoys from such ports as were thought least observed by the English, to take the advantage of dark nights, foggy weather, and even of seas and seasons, in which they could not expect to meet with any opposition from an enemy. While they made all the appearance of preparations to embark men and warlike implements and stores in the west, their store-ships and transports stole out of the southern ports, or in the channel, in weather that had driven the English off their coast; and, if they escaped the vigilance of our cruisers, placed their future safety in the fogs of Newfoundland, or in the ice of the river St. Lawrence; which none but the most distressed navigators would dare to encounter; or in the dangerous passage through the straits of Belleisle, unnoticed by the English cruisers in the bay of St. Lawrence. This did not escape the vigilance, nor fail of the care required in the minister, that watched to improve all advantages for his country, and to distress the enemy in every undertaking. Our squadrons and cruisers were so judiciously stationed and well instructed, that few of these desperadoes escaped.

See the reason on page 54. &c. Vol. III.
Another

Another expedient no less singular than the former, was to threaten England with an invasion by flat-bottomed boats. An incredible number of these boats were reported to be built in the ports of the channel. They were stationed in three divisions, to land a powerful army at three distant places at one time. Troops were marched down to the coast, and all sorts of military stores were prepared for embarkation: and the most amazing diligence was pretended at Rochefort, Brest, and other ports, to equip the whole remains of the French navy, to cover and support this invasion: By which means it was expected to distract the English councils, which heretofore had been so often frightened into a state of inactivity by the terrors of an invasion; and thereby to disconcert their present vigorous measures, and to prejudice the national credit. But this rather prompted the necessity of increasing the vigour of our measures, to attack them on their own coasts, to burn their ships and magazines, and to find employment for their troops to defend their own country. This raised our national credit to the highest pitch, and brought the French gasconade of an intended invasion into contempt, and to be the scoff of old women and children.

Every other project having failed, they at last disarmed and laid up their useless ships of war, and encouraged private adventurers to fit out privateers of considerable strength to interrupt our navigation and to distress our trade, which did us considerable damage on the coast of Scotland and Ireland,

An invasion threatened.

Why?

How prevented?

French privateers encouraged.

A. D. 1758. Ireland, in the chops of the channel, and from the Land's End to Holy Island, or the mouth of the Tweed: in the Levant, but most of all about the Capes of Virginia and our sugar islands, in which latitudes we suffered most. But they were not permitted to range those seas without chastisement, as the number mentioned above amongst the captures plainly convince us: and as it will more fully appear in the following actions.

Their
losses.

Remarkable capture of the Machault.

The year was introduced by the capture of the Machault privateer, of 14 nine pounders and 182 men, in Dungeness road, on the 1st day of January 1758, by the Adventure armed ship, commanded by Captain Bray for the King, and by Christopher Allison for the owners, in contract with the government. Captain Bray in his correspondence with the admiralty, (dated the 2d of January) informs them, That while he laid at anchor on the first of January, he saw a snow reach in for the Ness, which, at first, he took for a man of war, but that he cleared ship and veered away to the splice on the windlass: that, about two, cut the splice, and made sail large: that, in a few minutes after, they began to fire at each other, when judging that the enemy intended to rake the Adventure, HE ordered the helm to be put hard a port; which had the desired effect of laying her athwart hawse, her bowsprit coming in between his main-sail and mizen-masts. That we (he says) passed the end of the mizentop-sail sheer through his bob-stay, and made it fast; but fearing to lose such a good opportunity, and that they would get clear, got a hawser, and passed it three times round her bowsprit and the capstan on the quarter-deck, so that the action depended greatly on the small-arms, which was very smart about an hour. That she then struck her colours; that she began to fire again, when boarded; but was soon silenced; having 40 men killed and wounded; whereas the Adventure had but one man killed and two wounded.
She came out of Dunkirk on the 1st of January in the morning.

A. D.
1758.

This was such a gallant action, that the Lords of the Admiralty rewarded the captain, who assumes all the merit to himself, in this representation, with the command of the Princess Amelia an 80 gun ship. Captain Bray's merit, to be sure, was worthy of the reward. But his generosity, his humanity, his justice would have appeared with greater lustre had he, according to the example of other great men, both in our fleets and armies, given due praise to him or them, who prompted so happy and successful a measure; who worked the ship, to bring it to bear; and who put the first and chief hand to its execution; which appears to be rather an act originally suggested, and most likely to be managed by a dexterous well-experienced navigator, than by the officer engaged in the fighting of a ship. Accordingly we have an account before us, which confirms this supposition, and claims the greatest share in the glory of this action, for Mr. Christopher Allison, master

Remarks
on this action.

A. D.
1758.

of the Adventure for the owners, who is still aliye and prosperous; though he has been totally neglected,

Mr. Reed,

Spithead, January 30th, 1758.

Your favour of the 13th I received on the 20th, wherein I find you want to know the particulars of our action. The following is the truth, to the best of my knowledge; which is, I believe, better than any in the ship can give. On the first of January, Dungeness-light east by north from us four miles: about twelve at noon saw a snow-land in for Dungeness; which some took for one of our cruisers. Dinner being ready, Captain Bray gave orders for all the hammocks up, and clearing the ship, which was done in the time we were at dinner. Messieurs, smelling our beef, roast-pork, and plum-pudding, came down in order to deprive us of it: we dined on our beef and pork before they came: the pudding we fought for.

Being informed by the officer upon deck, that she was bearing down with an English jack flying, we went up, and soon saw what she was. Our captain's order was to heave in the cable: I told him, we had not time; it would be better to bear away to the splice and cut; in the mean time, loosed our top-sails and fore-sail, cut and bore away large: had not time to get our top-sails hoisted: being then within gun-shot, we fired. He immediately down English and up French colours, but did not fire at us. I told Captain Bray, his intent was to rake us, and desired to port our helm; which he gave orders for. Finding our ship to lay in the same position, I run to the wheel, and found the helm a star-board, put it a port as fast as I could, ship wearing very fast, and he steering towards us, with full sail, could not prevent boarding us: seeing in what position she was coming, I told Captain Bray, she was our own; only make her fast, she would not be able to get a gun to bear on us. From that I ran to cut the pikes down, expecting they had their men ready to board us, which they had; but receiving such a continual fire, they could not stand it. I called out to the pilot several times, with anger, who had hold of the bob-stay with his hand, to make her fast; neglected, both in the representation of the fact, and in the distribution of public rewards. A. D. 1758.

I laid

The Honourable Captain Byron, of his Majesty's ship the America, in company with the Coventry and Brilliant, returning from a cruise to Plymouth-Sound, informs * M. Cleveland, amongst

Of the Brilliant,
&c.

I laid down my musket, ran forward for a tow-line, sent some of the main-deck idlers to hand the end up, run aft with the end, reeved it through his bob-stay, brought it to the capstan, and took a round-turn with the other part. In the mean time Captain Bray, and the pilot, had got the mizen-top-sail sheet passed, and made it fast to a cleet on the mizen-mast, which came off. That being done, I returned to the musket, on which the action chiefly depended: about this time they made an attempt to rally their men, and to man their fore-castle; and dropt their fore-sail that we might not see them. One of the four pounders, in the round-house, cleared a way for us, by firing part of their fore-sail; renewing our musquetry, with more vigour, from the quarter-deck and round-house, they fled, to a man, for shelter: and I perceived their colours to be struck, which I called out accordingly, and fired my musquet in the air: four of us jumped upon their fore-castle barricading for boarding them, amongst whom was our pilot; but unexpected, they gave us a volley of small arms; on which we returned, without any damage. The firing, on both sides, continued about ten minutes longer, with three or four great guns, and so the action ended.

My mate, Mr. Headman, who signalized himself equal to any, received a shot in his wrist, and one of our marines a slight wound by a splinter: these two were wounded after their colours were struck. One of our marines was killed the first of the action. I am,

To Mr Joseph Reed, rope-maker, near St Dunstons Fields, London.

Yours,

CHRIST. ANTON.

* On January the 7th, 1758,

C c 4

other

A. D. 1758. other particulars, That in an engagement with the Diamond, a fine vessel of 200 tons and upwards, mounting fourteen carriage guns, richly laden with the finest furs from Quebec, all the after-part of her blew up, burnt with such violence for half an hour, that she sunk; only twenty-four out of seventy men could be saved; some of which were so miserably burnt that they died. That the Coventry had taken the Dragon privateer of Bayonne, a new ship, on her first cruise, carrying 24 nine pounders and 284 men; after an hour and a half's warm dispute. The privateer had four men killed and twelve wounded. The Coventry had only six wounded; one of whom died. And that the Brilliant had sunk, with her first broad-side, the Intrepide of Bayonne, a privateer of 14 guns and 130 men, ten of whom were killed, the rest were taken up by the Brilliant's boats.

The cruisers in the bay, and elsewhere, had most extraordinary success about this time: the Stirling-castle and Lowestoffe took two large French ships, laden with provisions, stores and soldiers for Louisbourg, being part of a convoy, that sailed from the Island of Aix, under the care of the Prudent and Capricieux, and the Tripon and Heroine frigates. Two more store-ships from Rochelle and Louisbourg, were taken by the Dunkirk. The Hussar fire-ship took a French frigate of 36 guns, 300 men, after killing 100 of the enemy: the Shannon also brought in a French frigate of 36 guns: and another of the same weight weight of metal was sunk by one of our men of war in the bay. A. D. 1758.

In the course of correspondence in this month, the admiralty received advice from Rear-Admiral Coates, That on the 21st of October last, Captain Forrest, in his Majesty's ship Augusta, with the Dreadnought and Edinburgh under his command, cruising off Cape François, was attacked by four ships of the line and three large frigates, intended to drive the small English squadron off the coast, and to clear the way for a large fleet of merchantmen, ready to sail from thence for Old France. Neither their number, nor strength, was able to frighten the three English captains, who unanimously agreed to fight them, and bore down upon the French squadron: that the action begun about twenty minutes past three, with great briskness on both sides, and continued for two hours and a half, at which time the French commodore made a signal, and one of the frigates went immediately and towed him out of the line, and was followed by the rest of his squadron, and by the same means.—That the English men of war had suffered so much in their masts, sails, and rigging, that they were in no condition to pursue them; so that the French, greatly disabled, were, by the help of the land-breeze, and their frigates towing them, got safe into port. The French lost 300 men killed, and had as many wounded.

Captain Forrest's
gallant
action.

* The Intrepide, Opiniatre, Sceptre, and Greenwich.

In

A.D. 1758. In the month of February Captain Elliot, in his Majesty's ship Hussar, took the Vengeance of 24 twelve and nine pounders, 20 swivels and 930 men; and the Torbay took a frigate of 26 guns, eighteen and twelve pounders, and 350 men, amongst whom were 100 gentlemen volunteers, fitted out on purpose, and desiring to take Captain Lockhart.

Of Captain
Faulkner.

His Majesty's ship Windsor, of 60 guns, Captain Faulkner, with the Escorte frigate, being sent to intercept two French frigates and three store-ships from Dunkirk-road to the westward, on the 27th of April, fell in with them about fifteen leagues from the Ram Head, when the two frigates brought to in a line, as if they intended to receive him, and the store-ships continued standing to the westward. When the Windsor came within about two gun shot of the frigates, they made all the sail they could towards the coast of France: upon which Captain Faulkner sent the Escorte after the store-ships, while he gave chase to the frigates, and continued it till four in the afternoon; when finding they greatly outtailed him, he gave it over, and made after their convoy, which could then but just be discerned from the poop. The next morning, at day-light, only one of them was to be seen, which the Windsor came up with and took. She was called the St. Peter, of near 400 tons burden, and her cargo consisted of provisions, and 1000 stand of arms, intended for Quebec. Another of these store-ships was fallen in with, the

the same day, by a squadron of his Majesty's ships to the westward, commanded by Captain Pratten, and was taken by Captain Douglas in the Alcide. She was called the Baden, about the same size with the other, and laden with provisions.

A.D.
1758,

On the 29th, about three o'clock in the afternoon, Captain Pratten seeing a sail to the south-west, made a signal for the Dorsetshire, of 70 guns and 320 men, commanded by Captain Dennis, to give chase; and soon after, observing the chase to be a large ship, dispatched the Achilles, of 60 guns, commanded by the Honourable Captain Barrington, also after her, and then followed them with the rest of the squadron. About seven o'clock the Dorsetshire came up with the chase, which proved to be the Raisonable, a French ship of war of 64 guns, and 630 men, and Captain Dennis began to engage her very closely, and they continued warmly engaged till about nine o'clock, when the enemy's ship, commanded by the Prince de Mombazon, Chevalier de Rohan, struck, having suffered greatly in her hull, and had 61 men killed, and 100 wounded. She was going from l'Orient to Brest, a new ship, not above four or five months off the stocks. The Dorsetshire's masts, yards and sails, were greatly shattered. She had 15 men killed, and 21 wounded, in the action, of whom one died of his wounds.

Of Captain
Dennis.

On the 12th of March the Buckingham and Cambridge attacked and levelled with the ground, a small fort in Grand Ance-bay, on the island of Martinico, destroying three privateers, and converting

Of Captain
Tynel.

A. D.
1758.

verting the fourth into a tender. But what does the greatest honour to Captain Tyrrel, the Commodore; is the following incident; when the fort was demolished, a village situated close by it was a strong temptation to men flushed with victory to attack, and they solicited warmly for leave to destroy it, but their brave commander replied, "Gentlemen, it is beneath us to render a number of poor people miserable, by destroying their habitations and little conveniencies of life; brave Englishmen scorn to distress even their enemies, when not in arms against them." This prevailed, and saved the lives of the innocent villagers.

Captures
at Jamaica.

Advices from Kingston in Jamaica, give an account that his Majesty's ship Augusta, Captain Forrest commander, had brought in to that port the Mars, a French frigate of 32 guns, twelve nine and six pounders, with her whole convoy, Le Theodore, of 22 guns; La Margueretta, of 16 guns; Le St. Pierre, of 16 guns; Le Solide, of 14 guns; Le Flore, of 14 guns; Le Mortice le Grand, of 18 guns; Le Brilliant, of 14 guns; and Le Monette, a brigantine of 10 guns, bound from Port Prince to Old France, laden with sugar, indigo, coffee, cotton, &c. which cost 170,000 l. The Mars struck upon receipt of the first broadside, and all the rest followed her example.

Captain
Mantle's
gallant
action.

A few days after arrived, at the same port, the privateer-sloop Thurloe, mounting 14 carriage guns, with 84 men, belonging to St. Kitt's, and commanded by Captain Mantle, with his prize the Deux Amis, a French Privateer, Captain Folin commander, commander, mounting ten carriage guns, with 98 men, belonging to Port Louis. The Frenchman bore down on Captain Mantle, who prepared to receive her, and being come very near, gave her a very warm salute, with both his great guns and small arms. The Deux Amis returned the compliment, and then made all the sail she could to get off. But the intrepid Mantle presently convinced her that she had met with a tartar, gave her chase, and soon ranged along-side of the enemy. The Frenchman having no choice but to fight or to strike, and despairing of success by his great guns, resolutely boarded the Thurloe on her bow, which brought on the most bloody and obstinate engagement that had been heard of in those seas for many years, both sides being determined to conquer or die. This bloody scene lasted almost three hours with pistols, swords, grenades, powder flasks, &c. so that Captain Mantle expended near 300 powder flasks, 72 stinking pots, and 11 rounds of great and small arms; had ten men killed and twenty-five wounded: but the slaughter on board the Deux Amis was so great, that there were only ten men found capable of bearing arms.

Captain Douglas, of his Majesty's ship the Alcide, having intelligence of a French frigate, called the Felicite, of 36 guns, and a flute, called

Of Captain Douglas.

the

In the month of April, Admiral Broderick being ordered on board the Prince George, man of war, appointed to carry him to the English fleet in the Mediterranean; and to convoy a numerous fleet of merchantmen for the Straights, where the

admiral

A.D.
1758.

the Robuste, of 24 guns, being sailed from Bourdeaux, with ordnance, shells and stores, for the forts, admiral was to relieve Admiral Osborne, the said ship took fire at sea, in broad day-light; of which we have the following accounts, which are worthy of attention.

From the Reverend Mr. Sharp, chaplain.

Glasgow, or Lisbon, April 20.

On Thursday the 15th instant, at half an hour past one in the afternoon, word was passed in the ward-room, by the company, that the fore-part of our ship, the Prince George, was on fire. The lieutenants ran immediately forward, and myself, with many others, went directly on the quarter-deck, when we found the whole ship's crew was alarmed. The pumps were headed out, engines and buckets carried forward, and every immediate remedy applied. The admiral, with the lieutenants on watch, kept the quarter-deck, from whence he sent such orders as he thought most expedient for the preservation of the ship, and the souls in her. Captain Payton, and the lieutenants, on watch, found that the fire broke out first in the housewife's stow-room, of which place large quantities of water were applied; but in vain; for the flames were so very great and hot, that the poor creatures could not get near enough to the flames for their labour to have any effect. On which Captain Payton ordered knuties to be made, that the water might be poured in by that means: but there he was defeated likewise, for only two chambers could be found, and they had nothing to work with, for a long time, but a hammer and chisel each. The lower gun deck ports were then opened, but the water that flowed in was not sufficient to stop the violence of the flames. He ordered likewise the powder-room to be wetted, lest the ship should immediately be blown up, and every soul perish in an instant. This had the desired effect; and for some minutes we had hammering hopes, and knocking the above mentioned, as I was doing myself, worked with the men as long as I could stand it, went up stairs, and returned again instantly, and consequently at forts, and the use of the men of war stationed at Hispaniola, steered a course to intercept them, and

A. D. 1758.

eye-witness, therefore declare them as facts. The fire soon increased, and raged violently aft on the larboard side; and as the destruction of the ship was now found inevitable, the preference of the admiral was first consulted. Captain Payton came on the quarter-deck, and ordered the barge to be manned, into which the admiral entered with near forty more; for now there was no distinction, every man's life was equally precious. The admiral, finding the barge would overset, stripped himself naked, and committed himself to the mercy of the waves, and after toiling an hour, he was at length taken up by a merchantman's boat. Captain Payton kept the quarter-deck an hour after the admiral left it, when he happily got into a boat from the fleet-bitter, and was put safe on board the Alderney sloop. I cannot be deficient even to attempt a description of the melancholy scene that was before me; shriekings, cries, lamentations, bemoanings, raving, despair, and even madness itself polluted themselves. It was now high time to think of taking care of myself. I looked from every part of the ship for my preservation, and soon saw three boats off the stern of the ship. I went immediately to my cabin, and offered up my prayers to God, particularly thanking him for giving me such resolution and composure of mind. I then jumped into the sea from one of the gun-room ports, and swam to a boat, which put me safe on board the Alderney sloop. There are near 300 people saved, and more might have been saved, had the merchantmen behaved like human creatures; but they kept a long way to windward the whole time; and if possible, to their greater shame be it spoken, instead of saving the men that swam to their boats, they were employed in taking up geese, fowls, tables, chairs, and whatever else of the kind came near them.

From Mr. Perry, an officer, dated as above.
About half past one at noon, being in the office adjoining to the cabin, I saw the admiral run out, with two or three officers, and immediately

A. D. 1758. and was so lucky as, on the 15th of September, to come up with and to take the Robuste, about 20 leagues sicars; on enquiring the cause, I was alarmed with the ship's being on fire forwards, and it was believed in the boatswain's fore store-room; every method was taken to extinguish it, but the smoke was so violent, no person could get near enough to find where the fire was. About half past two we made the signal of distress; but to render our situation more wretched, the fog came on very thick, and the wind freshened, and it was near four before the Glasgow and Alderney got intelligence of our condition; when they repeated the signal, hoisted out their boats, and stood towards us; but they not knowing we had taken care to float our powder, were under sad apprehensions we might blow up, and therefore could not (consistent with their own safety) give us the assistance our deplorable condition rendered us so much in need of. We attempted to scuttle the decks, to let the water on the fire, but the people could not stand a minute without being near suffocated. About half past four the smoke increased, and the flames began to break out: the admiral then ordered the boats to be hoisted out, got the barge out, and went off, promising to bring a ship along-side of us. I observed her so full, her gunwale was almost with the water, and, in a few minutes after, saw her sink at some distance a-stern, and not above three or four were saved out of near forty, among whom it pleased God to preserve the admiral. The weather was now become clear, but none of the merchantmen would come near us. Our officers behaved well, and endeavoured to keep the people to the pumps and drawing water, but they now were become quite ungovernable. About a quarter before five, Captain Payton left the ship, and promised us the admiral's aid, but was not able to accomplish it. About five the long-boat was endeavoured to be got out, in which were near 100 people; but as they were hoisting her out, one of the tackles gave way, by which she overset, and almost every soul perished; we were now reduced to the greatest distress. You may 60 leagues west of Cape Finisterre, laden with 6 twenty-four pounders, 12 eighteen-pounders, 6 iron

A. D.
1758.

may have some idea of our miserable condition, when I tell you the ship began to be in flames fore and aft, spreading like flax; people distressed, not knowing what they did, and jumping over-board from all parts. I was reduced to the melancholy choice of either burning with the ship, or going over-board. Very few that could swim were taken up; and I that could not swim must have very little hopes indeed. About a quarter past five I went into the admiral's stern gallery, where two young gentlemen were lashing two tables together for a raft; I assisted them, and one of them proposed to make fast the lashing to the gallery, and lower ourselves down to the tables, then cut the lashing, and commit ourselves to the mercy of providence: we hoisted over the tables, but being badly lashed, one of them we lost; as soon as the other was down, I proposed to venture first, which they readily consented to: there was now three boats a-stern; this was the time or never; down I went by the rope; but as there was a great swell of sea, it was impossible for any one to follow me, and I was turned adrift. By the cries of the people from the ship to the boats, in about five minutes I was taken up, very near drowned.

715 complement.

260 saved.

90 passengers to Gibraltar.

485 lost.

745

745

From a midshipman, dated as above.

On Thursday the 13th, about half an hour past one in the afternoon, we were alarmed with fire in the boatwain's fore store-room, which put us all into great disorder; and it being a very thick fog, we could not see one ship in the fleet. We kept firing guns of distress, and no ship appearing in sight for an hour, we were all in the greatest consternation; but the fog then dispelling, the Glasgow hailed us, to whom we told our condition, and earnestly begged of them to save our lives.

A. D. 1758. iron mortars, 3000 shells thirteen inches diameter, and with cordage, canvas, flour, and several other stores.

The fire still increasing, we were obliged to knit out our boats, which from our confusion were near three hours fixing to the tackles, &c. every body being engaged in preparing to save himself. The poop, stern, and quarter galleries, with the sides, were lined with men and boys, crying out in a most moving manner to be assisted. During this time, out of twenty-three sail of ships, we had but three boats to our assistance, and those would not come near the ship for fear of being sunk, the poor fellows continually jumping over-board; great numbers of whom were drowned in our sight.

We got our boats out, which never returned after going once. By this time the fire had communicated itself to the middle gun deck, and nobody could go down below, every one expecting his death every minute, either by fire or water, and were taking leave of each other. Soon after going out of the admiral's cabin, I saw the flames coming out in the backway of the upper gun-deck; I retreated immediately, and took my leave of the petty officers that were there, and went over the starboard stern ladder, to save myself by swimming, and thanks be to Almighty God, reached a boat, and was taken up.

I had just got clear of the ship when the flames became general, and those poor unhappy wretches that could not swim, were obliged to remain upon the wreck, with the fire falling down upon them. Shortly after the masts went away, and killed numbers, and those that were not killed by the masts, thought themselves happy to get upon them. But the ship rolling, by reason of the great fire, the fire had communicated itself to the guns, which swept them off the deck in great numbers, they being all loaded and shotted.

Such a terrible sight the oldest men in the fleet say they never saw. Thus ended our unhappy ship, after burning six hours and a half, who had as complete a crew, and was as well manned as any ship that ever sailed from England.

notes. This was followed by the capture of the Caumartin privateer of Dunkirk, commanded by
M. Jean

A. D.
1758.

Letter from the master of a merchantman under convoy of Admiral Broderick.

Thursday, April 19. Ushant bearing east sixty leagues distance, at noon I saw admiral Broderick hoist a signal of distress; upon which I made what sail I could and went down to him. At one in the afternoon I could discern the Prince George on fire; at two drew pretty near her, but thought they might have quenched the fire. At three o'clock I saw plainly there was no quenching it. I was within a hundred yards of her stern, but durst not venture along-side, the sea beating high; besides, the going off of her guns, and danger of blowing up. At four in the afternoon the admiral was taken up swimming, by a merchant ship's boat, as then the ships that had boats were all out, and a good many of them lost. The weather proving bad, towards night I was within pistol-shot, and there remained some time; and picked up four of her crew; and had not two of my men run away with my boat the night before we sailed from St. Helen's, I am confident I could have saved fifty or eighty of them at least, as I was all the time nearer to them than any ship in the fleet.
What made me venture so near was, that I knew my ship went well, and was under good command. At six, what a dismal sight! the masts and sails all in a blaze; hundreds of souls hanging by the ropes along-side; I could count fifty of them hanging over in the stern-ladder, others in the sea on oars and pieces of wood; a melancholy spectacle; besides the dismal cries from the ship, which still ring in my ears. Half an hour past the flames broke out at her broadside, and in less than five minutes every bit of her was in flames, and so continued till seven, when she overset, but did not sink. I then ran within twenty yards of her, but my people compelled me to go further off, for fear of striking on the wreck. All I can further say of it, there never was a more shocking sight; pray

D d 2

God

A.D.
1758.

Belliquieux
taken.

M. Jean Baptiste de Cock, new from the stocks, mounting 16 six pounders, stuck full of swivels and musquetoons, burden 280 tons, and carrying 147 men. She was taken by his Majesty's ship the Southampton, Captain Gilchrist, after an obstinate engagement of almost three hours. But the most surprising capture was the Belliquieux, pierced for 66 guns, and had 64 mounted, with 417 men on board. This French man of war had got into Lundy-road. Which being noticed to Captain Saumerez, of his Majesty's ship Antelope, lying at Bristol, he sailed in quest of the enemy; and beat down the channel, as well as he could, with a contrary wind. And next day (the 1st of November) got sight of the Frenchman at anchor, below Ilfrecombe; who immediately weighed, stood towards the Antelope, hoisted her colours, as she drew near, and seemed prepared to engage: but soon after hauled them down. Being now within gun-shot, Captain Saumerez fired at the Frenchman, and, meeting with no return, sent a boat with his first lieutenant, to know if they had surrendered. The boat not returning, the Antelope bore down under her stern, and de-

God that I may never see the like again. It was very grievous for me that I could not save more of her men, without running the risk of sharing her fate. The 18th of April the Glasgow, a twenty gun ship, hoisted the signal for all masters of merchant ships to come on board, where the admiral had his flag hoisted, to know how many people we had saved amongst us, and to deliver them up. By the then list it appeared, that the admiral, Captain Payton, and about 253 men, were saved.

On the 31st of October, 1758.

manding,

ADMIRAL TYRRELL.

manding, whether she had struck, the Belliqueux answered in the affirmative, without firing a shot. She had taken the Carnarvan Indiaman in her passage; but had parted with her in a gale of wind: which was afterwards retaken by admiral Boscawen's squadron. The Belliqueux was valued at 150,000 l.

A. D.
1758.

The Rinoceros, of 36 guns, 700 tons, from Quebec, was taken about the same time by the Isis, Captain Wheeler, who took out her people and sunk her. And two days after the Buckingham, of 65 guns, 472 men able to do duty, Captain Richard (now Admiral) Tyrrel, commander, attacked the Florissant of 74 guns, and 700 men; a frigate of 38 guns, and 350 men, and another of 28 guns, and 250 men. The engagement was close and obstinate, in which the captain was wounded and obliged to leave the deck and the command to the brave Mr. Marshal, his first lieutenant, who, having with courage and dexterity brought the Buckingham close up to the Florissant, was killed by the first broadside. The second lieutenant took the command, and with equal bravery and conduct fought the ship till he made the enemy sheer off, with considerable damage in their ships, and loss of men. Whereas the Buckingham had no more than seven men killed, 17 dangerously, and 31 slightly wounded.

Rinoceros.

Florissant.

In the list of King's ships lost this year, we find the Litchfield, of 50 guns, Captain Barton, which being separated from Commodore Keppel's squadron by a storm off Cape Cantin, in their expedi-

Litchfield wrecked.

THE GENERAL HISTORY OF

A. D. 1758. tion against Gores, was stranded on the coast of Barbary. By which accident 120 men were drowned, and 220 were seized by the Moors and carried into slavery, till redeemed, at a vast expence, by the government. The Wintholsea man of war, of Ships of war taken by the enemy.

24 guns, taken in her passage from South Carolina, by a French man of war of 64 guns, and a frigate of 36. In the windward passage, a French man of war of 74 guns, picked up the Stork sloop; and the Bolton tender was taken off Mounts Bay, by a snow privateer of 16 guns, after an engagement of three hours.

So that the account of the ships of war, taken from, and by the French in the course of this year, stands as follows:

Ships of war taken this year from France.

French ships of war taken or destroyed.

Ships.	Guns.	By whom taken.
Foudroyant	80	Admiral Osborne.
Esperance	74	the Orford .
Alcide	64	} Admiral Boscawen,
Lys	64
Orpheus	64	Admiral Osborne,
Raisable	64	the Dorsetshire .
Arc-en-Ciel	50	the Litchfield .
Duc d'Aquitain	50	the Eagle .
Aquilon	48	the Antelope .
Royal Chariot	36	the Torbay .
Hermione	36	the Unicorn .
Melampus	34	the Tartar .
Emerald	34	the Southampton .
		Nymph

THE LATE WAR.

485

Ship.	Gun.	By whom taken.	A. D.
Nymph	34	the Hampton-court .	1757
Bruce	30	the Huffar .
Galata	22	the Essex .
	784

English ships of war taken during the war by the French.

Warwick	60	} In the West-Indies,
Greenwich	50
Wichamstead	24
	134
	650	Balance in favour of the English.

In this year we have seen the British flag restored to its ancient dignity, and our enemies obliged to yield up the dominion of the seas to the superiority of the British navy.—A year, which will for ever record the wisdom of our national councils, the conduct of our officers, and the bravery of our men employed in the public service, both by sea and land; and the cheerfulness, with which all ranks and denominations amongst the people contributed towards their support.—A year, most severely felt by all that directly or indirectly ventured to disturb the peace, and interrupt the trade

Remarks
on the events of this year.

* Here I take the liberty to rectify a mistake in the account in note*, page 390. Vol. I. where it was related from the London Gazette, that Captain SHOULDHAM was killed in that engagement, and have the pleasure to inform the reader, that the said Captain was not killed.

Printed by

D d 4

of

A. D.
1758.

of the British dominions, or to carry on a clandestine commerce with the enemies of Great Britain — A year, which demonstrated, by the great increase of its commerce, that the strength and riches of the nation depend upon those measures, which were then taken by the ministry to protect our navigation, and to bear all opposition out of the sea.

On the administra-
tion.

The plan laid down by the ministry for the operations of this year, was to secure this island from invasion, and to defeat the schemes for raising our colonies in America; in preference to any interest of our allies, on the continent; though not without paying a due regard to those treaties, and that interest, which require the aid of Britain in defence of the liberties of Europe in general, and of the protestant interest in particular.

For this purpose, they did not apply to Hanover, Hesse, and Holland, for a military aid, to be imported hither at an immense expence, to guard our coast against a French invasion: a measure, by which former ministers had lavished away the riches of the nation; exposed the British courage to the ridicule and contempt of the enemy; encouraged them to hector over a disarmed people, terrified by every report of their motions towards the coast of the channel, and endangered the common liberty of these kingdoms, by placing our privileges, property, and lives, under the protection of a foreign army. But they provided for our internal security by constituting a regular and well-disciplined militia, whose expence doth not amount to a tenth part of 10,000 foreign auxiliaries imported,

ported, and whose strength is ten times more to be relied upon. The hireling will flee in time of danger: but he, who takes up a weapon for self-defence, will die rather than be made a slave.

A. D.
 1758.

Our fleets were not blocked up in the ports of England, to wait the delusive motions of the French armaments and preparations, pretended to waft their troops in flat-bottomed boats into Britain:
 neither was our army augmented to consume the national treasure in idleness at home, and in unprofitable and expensive encampments and parade.—
 The British navy was permitted to carry its power into the ocean, and the army to enter into actual service.—The happy fruits of which councils, were gathered in the conquest of Senegal, Goree, and Louisbourg, with other acquisitions in North America, and in the damages done to the enemy on the coast of France, exclusive of the destruction of the French navy, and the total stop put to their trade and commerce, both in their own and in neutral bottoms. Yet these great and glorious advantages are no more than an earnest of that success, which was obtained afterwards by the vigorous measures now adopted.

Till now the British lion had not been at liberty to make use of his natural weapons, and to exert his strength; nor in a situation to give proofs of his conduct and courage.—A long series of pacific measures had almost worn out the veterans, and the navy and army were too much under the command of fine gentlemen, whose gaieties, pleasures, self-indulgence, and connections with those men in power,
 that

On British
 courage.

A. D.
1759

that preserved any measure to a steady war, were bed incitements to military glory. Yet, that la-zine courage, which will always discover itself in the English, when led on to action, was no sooner delivered from the coils, which had for many years kept them in a state of inactivity, but we saw them brave all dangers: St. Malo and Cherbourg felt the power of their arms: St. Bas is a monument of their intrepidity; and the undaunted resolution with which the landing was made at Gibraltor-bay, shows that our seamen and soldiers only wanted an opportunity to convince the world, that they are the descendants of those heroes who conquered France,
 and for ages heretofore maintained the dominion of the sea.

How far those measures tended towards composing all murmurings at home, and to influence foreign states in our favour, was immediately seen in the uniting of parties for promoting the national interest, and in that weight, which our advantages had amongst some persons abroad, who might otherwise have been induced by family attachments and Gallic intrigue, to join our natural enemies.

By the measures upon which the operations of this year were executed, our enemies were deprived of those means, without which it was impossible to continue that war with advantage, which they began with hopes to ruin their neighbours. Their navigation was entirely ruined; and their device to avail themselves of the friendship of Dutch carriers, turned out, not only to their greater loss, but furnished England with an opportunity to convince a treacherous treacherous ally, that whoever, under the cover of A. D. 1758.

a neutrality, take upon them to council, to aid, or to support, the enemies of Great Britain, must expect to be treated as her professed enemies, when taken in the act of covering the enemy's property.

Their distress in France at this juncture is not to be described. The new manner of attacking them, this summer, threw their ministry into confusion. The moment that the French were made to feel the weight of our natural strength, their councils, which had been cried up so much for unanimity and consistency, were divided, confused, and rendered incapable of doing any thing effectually, either for invading us, or for defending their own trade and dominions. Nothing prospered in their cabinet, nothing succeeded in their operations, to effect, either by sea or land, during the whole year. Their merchants were no longer able to support their credit, their manufactures were at a stand, and their whole land mourned over the ravages made by the distresses of a bloody, expensive, inglorious, and ruinous war. Distress of France.

From the time we adopted those measures, the nation has not been terrified by reports of a French army to invade us, and to cut our throats. We have had no heart-burnings at home about raising of money to carry on a war for the sole advantage of some petty ally; neither has our trade and commerce been exposed to the force of our enemies, nor to the treachery of our false friends. Flourishing state of Great Britain.

The flourishing state of our colonies, of our islands, of all our settlements and kingdoms, both for

A. D.
1718.

for their imports, and exports in the course of the year past, exceed all that ever was before. Our merchants and manufacturers, our planters and navigators, were never in so fair a way to serve themselves and their country. Both riches and seamen increased under the protection of a well-regulated and appointed navy. The nation that can best protect their trade, will be always most capable of finding the sinews of war; and the most extensive navigation is most likely to turn out the greatest number of able-bodied seamen, without which a maritime nation cannot subsist.

Such was the state of the nation when the parliament met, on the 23d day of November. The session was opened by commission: and his Majesty being indisposed, the Lord Keeper, by his Majesty's command, made the following speech.

"My Lords, and Gentlemen,

The King's
speech.

IN pursuance of the authority given to us by his Majesty's commission under the great seal, amongst other things to declare the causes of his holding this parliament, his Majesty has been graciously pleased to direct us to assure you, that he always receives the highest satisfaction, in being able to lay before you any events that may promote the honour and interest of his kingdoms.

That, in consequence of your advice, and enabled by that assistance, which you unanimously gave him, his Majesty has exerted his endeavours to carry on a war in the most vigorous manner, in order to that desirable end, always to be wished;

TO BE CONTINUED I

a safe

A. D.
1751

a safe and honourable peace. It has pleased the divine Providence to bless his Majesty's measures and arms with success in several parts; and to make our enemies feel, that the strength of Great Britain is not to be provoked with impunity.

We have it also in command from his Majesty to acquaint you, that the conquest of the strong fortrefs of Louisbourg, with the islands of Cape Breton and St. John; the taking of Frontenac, of the highest importance to our operations in North America; and the reduction of Senegal; cannot fail to bring great distress upon the French commerce, and colonies; and, in proportion, to procure great advantages to our own. That nation has also been made sensible, that, whilst their forces are sent forth to invade and ravage the dominions of their neighbours, their own coasts are not inaccessible to his Majesty's fleets and armies. This they have experienced in the demolition of their works at Cherbourg, effected at a great expence, with a particular view to annoy this country; and in the loss of a great number of ships and vessels; but so treatment, however injurious to his Majesty, could tempt him to make retaliation on the innocent subjects of that crown.

In Germany, his Majesty's good brother the King of Prussia, and Prince Ferdinand of Brunswick, have found full employment for the armies of France, and her confederates; from which our operations, both by sea, and in America, have derived the most evident advantage. Their successes, owing, under God, to their able conduct, and the bravery

A. D.
1738

bravery of his Majesty's troops and those of his allies, have been signal and glorious.

His Majesty has further commanded us to observe to you, that the common cause of liberty and independency is still making noble and vigorous efforts, against the unnatural union formed to oppress it. That the commerce of his subjects, the source of our riches, has by the vigilant protection received from his Majesty's fleet, flourished in a manner not to be paralleled during such troubles. In this state of things, his Majesty, in his wisdom, thinks it unnecessary to use many words to persuade you to bear up against all difficulties; effectually to stand by, and defend his Majesty; vigorously to support the King of Prussia; and the rest of his Majesty's allies; and to exert yourselves to reduce our enemies to equitable terms of accommodation.

Gentlemen of the House of Commons,

The uncommon extent of this war, in different parts, occasions it to be uncommonly expensive. This his Majesty has ordered us to declare to you, that he sincerely laments, and feels deeply for the burthen of his people. The several estimates are ordered to be laid before you; and his Majesty desires only such supplies, as shall be requisite to prosecute war with advantage, and be adequate to the necessary services.

My Lords, and Gentlemen,

His Majesty has, in the last place, graciously commanded us to assure you, that Britain is much satisfaction

A.D.
1758.

satisfaction in that good harmony, which subsists among his faithful subjects, that it is more proper for him now to thank you for it, than to repeat his exhortations to it. This union, necessary at all times, is more especially so in such critical conjunctures; and his Majesty doubts not, but the good effects we have found from it, will be the strongest motives to you to pursue it."

This speech was received with great approbation by both houses of parliament, who had never heard such an enumeration of national advantages, in return for the supplies, they had raised for the support of wars, under former administrations.

Remarks,
and the addresses
of both houses.

They
in the most humble manner presented the Lords spiritual and temporal, and assembled in parliament assembled.

Die Martis, 23^o Novembris, 1758.

Most Gracious Sovereign. Your Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the Lords spiritual and temporal, in parliament assembled, beg leave to approach your Majesty, with hearts full of that duty and affection, which your sacred person and government, which become the most faithful subjects to the best of kings.

That constant regard and attention, which your Majesty has shown to the honour and interest of your kingdoms, have filled our minds with the most grateful sentiments; and we see, with true satisfaction, those active and vigorous efforts, which your Majesty, in your great wisdom, has made, steadily on the war with vigour, in order to the desirable end, which we all wish, a safe and lasting tranquillity.

Justice and good policy required, that our thoughts should be directed to the consideration of the means, by which the public and private interests of the nation may be promoted, and the

A. D.
1756.

They acknowledge their real satisfaction with the measures that had been taken: and most truly congratulate the strength of the British nation. We acknowledge, with becoming thankfulness, the goodness of the divine Providence, in having crowned your Majesty's measures and arms with success, in several parts; and we joyfully congratulate your Majesty, on the conquest of the strong fortresses of Louisbourg, with the islands of Cape Breton and St. John, the taking of Frontenac, and the reduction of Senegal. The high importance of these successes is apparent, in the reputation thereby acquired to your Majesty's arms, and in the distress they must fall to upon the French commerce and colonies, as well as the happy effects procured to those of Great Britain.

We have seen, with the warmest emotions of indignation, the exorbitant devastations committed by the arms of France upon the dominions of your Majesty, and those of your allies, in Germany. They must not have forgotten how much, in consequence of their unbridled ambition to invade their neighbours, their own coasts are exposed, in the demolition of their expensive works at Cherbourg, particularly intended for the annoyance of this country; and in the loss of so many ships and vessels, as well prizes as others, in the ports. At the same time, we cannot sufficiently admire your Majesty's clemency and moderation, in not having visited with equal severity the innocent subjects of that country, the injuries of which you have repaired.

We have a just sense of the real advantages derived to the operations of Great Britain in particular, as well as to the common cause in general, from the wise conduct of the King of Prussia, and Prince Ferdinand of Brunswick, from the abilities, and the bravery of your Majesty's officers, and that of your allies, have been signally conspicuous in the success with which they have been attended, and must be universally admired by all Europeans. Nothing can possibly be of greater national importance than the navigation and commerce of your subjects; and we gratulated his Majesty on the success of his arms. They were sensible of the importance of our conquests;

A. D.
1757.

return your Majesty our dutiful thanks for that protection and security, which they have received from your royal care, in the disposition of your fleet, to which their present flourishing condition is so much owing. The flagration of our enemy's trade, and the taking and destroying so many of their capital ships of war, ought, in this view, to be reckoned amongst the most happy events.

Permit us to declare our grateful sense of that paternal tenderness, which your Majesty has expended for the burdens of your people. We received from thence the strongest encouragement to adhere, the more firmly, to the cause of the protestant religion and public liberty, against any unnatural union formed to oppress it. In this just cause we will, to our utmost ability, stand by and defend your Majesty; support the King of Prussia, and the rest of your allies; and vigorously exert ourselves to reduce our enemies to equitable terms of accommodation.

Our duty and fidelity to your Majesty, and our zeal for the protection of religion in your royal family, are uniform and unshaken; our prayers for the prolongation of your precious life, and that you may reign over us, are sincere and fervent; and we beg leave to give your Majesty the strongest assurances, that nothing shall be wanting, on our part, to improve union and good harmony amongst all your subjects, for promoting and securing those interesting and essential objects.

His Majesty's most gracious answer.

My Lord,

I receive your very humble thanks for this very dutiful and affectionate address. The affection which you express in my nation, and the support due to my honour and support, the confidence of my subjects, and the assistance of my allies, as well as your zeal and our vigour, are highly acceptable to me. They evince that you possess the best spirit in the present contest.

Vol. III.

R.

The

A. D.
1758
1758

quests; and with the warmest emotions, resented the French inhumanity towards our German allies. They

The honourable the House of Commons presented their address to his Majesty, which was as follows:

Most Gracious Sovereign,

We your Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the Commons of Great Britain, in parliament assembled, render your Majesty our most sincere and hearty thanks for the speech delivered by your Majesty's command, to both houses of parliament.

We beg leave to congratulate your Majesty, with hearts full of the most unfeigned joy, upon the many signal successes, with which it has pleased divine Providence to bless your Majesty's measures and arms in several parts of the world; particularly in the important conquest of the strong fortresses of Louisbourg; with the islands of Cape Breton and St. John; the taking of Frontenac, so essential to our operations in North America; the reduction of the valuable settlement of Senegal; the total demolition of the harbour and works of Cherbourg, erected at so great expence by the enemy, with a particular view to annoy this country; and the destruction of the shipping and privateers in the ports of France.

Your Majesty's faithful Commons feel, with the highest satisfaction, how greatly these events redound to the honour and interests of your Majesty's kingdoms, to the upholding the reputation of the British arms, and to the maintaining and extending the glories of your Majesty's reign.

We have the most lively sense of the happy consequences (under God) of your Majesty's wisdom in the preservation of the naval force of these kingdoms, to the maintenance and defence of the fleet, trade, and navigation of Europe; whilst the sovereignty of Great Britain flourishes in full perfection and security; and as the love of justice and magnanimity, in readily supplanting former

THE GENERAL HISTORY OF THE CRUISE OF THE GREAT BRITAIN

1757
D. 335
A. 10
1757

may allowed that the operations of Great Britain in America, &c. received real advantages from the and in carrying on with vigour, in all parts, this arduous and necessary war.

It is with joy and admiration we see the glorious efforts made in Germany, by your Majesty's great ally the King of Prussia; and those made by Prince Ferdinand of Brunswick, seconded by the valour of your Majesty's troops, and those of your allies; and that full employment has thereby been given to all the arms of France, and of her confederates: from which, our operations, both by sea and in America, have received the most evident and important advantages.

Permit us to assure your Majesty, that your faithful Commons, justly animated in defence of the rights of your Majesty's crown, and of the protestant religion, and the common cause of liberty and independency, against the dangerous union, which hath been formed to oppress them, will bear up against all difficulties, and exert themselves to the utmost, by granting to your Majesty such supplies as shall be necessary, especially to fund by, and defend your Majesty, and vigorously to support the King of Prussia, and the rest of your Majesty's allies: firmly relying on the wisdom and goodness of your Majesty, that the same will be applied, in the properest manner, to push the war with advantage, and to reduce the enemy to equitable terms of a safe, honourable, and lasting peace.

We beg leave, also, to express our most grateful sense of the personal satisfaction your Majesty takes, in that good harmony which subsists amongst your faithful subjects; and of your Majesty's gracious acceptance of the universal zeal and affection of your people; which salutary union hath enabled us so effectually to resist our threats abroad, and hath preserved, at home, tranquillity, safety, and public credit; and we trust, that the continuance of the same truly national spirit will, by the blessing of God, be attended with the most happy effects for the future.

A.D. 1758
 the war in Germany, and promised, to their most, effectually to stand by and defend his Majesty, and support the King of Prussia, and the rest of his allies. They thanked him for his royal care in the disposition of the fleet, to which the flourishing condition of our trade was so much owing; and reckoned the stagnation of the enemy's trade, and the taking and destroying so many of their capital ships of war, amongst the most happy events. And we shall see that the parliament of

Great

Gentlemen,

I return you my thanks for your dutiful and affectionate address; and for this fresh mark of your unanimous and in defence of me and my crown, and of my good brother the King of Prussia, and the rest of my allies.

You may depend on my constant endeavours for the preservation of my kingdoms, their trade, and colonies; and for the liberties of Europe.

Guns.

Taken by

64 Alcide } By Admiral Boscawen in North America.

64 *Ips }

50 — In North America, by the Norwich and Landfield.

36 Chas. Royal Blunt, in the Bay of Biscay, by the Torrey.

16 *Rondelet, in the channel, by the Ips.

26 *Rondelet, off Brest, by the Southampton.

28 *Hermione, in the Bay, by the Unicorn.

28 *Bismarck, in ditto, by the Shearwater.

28 *Foudroyant, in the Mediterranean, by the Orion.

64 *Orion, in the Bay, by the Rfax.

22 Galatee, in the Bay, by the Rfax.

22 *Raisonné, in ditto, by the Dorsetshire.

44 *Lone,

Great Britain did not mean these addresses to be mere echo or compliment to their sovereign, but that

A.D. 1733.

that 64 Flote, mounted only 26, when taken in the Mediterranean, by the St. Albans.

- 64 Blanchant,
- 30 Diaz, } at Louisbourg, by ARMING Boscawen
- 64 Edo,
- 15 Guistade, in the channel, by the Rainbow.
- 14 Hanovre, in ditto, by the Lizard.
- 64 Belliqueux, in Bristol channel, by the Antelope.

200 Guns.

French ships of war lost since that time.

- 74 Esperance, sunk in the Bay, by the Orford.
- 64 Leopard, burnt at Louisbourg.
- 30 Concord, lost in the Bay.
- 46 Junon, lost at the entrance of Mahon harbour.
- 48 Aquilon, destroyed by the Antelope.
- 24 Nympha, burnt by the Hampton-Court, on the island of Majorca.
- 30 Branc, sunk in the Bay, by the Husar and Dolphin.
- 24 Matine, lost on the Dogger-bank.
- 64 Opiniatre,
- 64 Eveille, } lost at Brest.
- 50 Greenwich,
- 50 ——— burnt on the rocks at St. Maloes.
- 74 Entrepreneur,
- 74 Prudent,
- 64 Capricieux,
- 64 Celebre, } All sunk or otherwise destroyed at Louisbourg.
- 50 Aposton,
- 24 Fidele,
- 16 Biche,
- 36 Cherre,
- 26 Rose, burnt on the island of Majorca, by the Medmouth.
- 16 Rhinoceros, sunk in the Bay, by the Isis.
- 998 Guns. Besides two frigates, names unknown, burnt at St. Maloes.

An D.
1758.

that they were in earnest, and acted conformable to those declared sentiments, and that they had the pleasure to find their acts to be entirely satisfactory to their constituents, as well as to the court.

The irreconcilable disposition of the belligerent powers made it apparent, that the only way to procure an honourable and lasting peace was not to abate in our vigour, but as much as possible to exert the power of Great Britain: and in this would add to the burden of the war, the Commons, with the greatest cheerfulness and unanimity, voted 12,749,860 l. for to enable his Ma-

The grants for the
year 1759.

gesty to perform the intentions of his speech. It will

Ships of war taken by the French in that year

Guns.

60 Warwick, in the West-Indies, by D'Aubigny's Squadron.
50 Greenwich, in ditto, by Beaufremont's.

110 Guns.

English ships lost during the year

66 Mars, in Halifax harbour.
60 Tilbury, off Louisbourg.
74 Invincible, near Languon harbour.
80 Prince George, burnt going to the Mediterranean.

180 Guns.

Grants for the year 1759.

For 60,000 seamen, including 14,343 marines,
and ordnance for sea service. 3,750,000

For 52,343 effective men for guards and garrisons, and other land forces in Great Britain, Guernsey
and Jersey. 1,131,000

For the pay of the general and staff officers, and officers of the hospital. 524,840

will also be an illustrious and perpetual monument to the minister's honour, that this sum, which exceeds

For the forces and garrisons in the plantations and Gibraltar, and for provisions for the garrisons in Nova Scotia, Newfoundland, Providence, Cape Breton, and Senegal ————— 742,531

For four regiments of foot, and one battalion, in the Irish establishment, serving in North America and Africa ————— 48,879

For the charge of the office of ordnance for land service ————— 220,700

For the extra expence of the ordnance in 1758, not provided for ————— 329,988

For the ordinary of the navy, including the half-pay to sea officers ————— 238,491

For the support of Greenwich hospital ————— 10,000

For 38,000 of the troops of Hanover, Wolfenbuttel, Saxe Gotha, and Buckeburg, with the general and staff officers ————— 398,698

For 19,012 Hessians, with the general and staff officers, and the officers of the hospital, and train of artillery, pursuant to treaty ————— 339,489

Towards defraying the charges of forage, &c. for the army under Prince Ferdinand ————— 500,000

Towards paying off the debt of the navy ————— 1,000,000

For allowance to the officers and private men of the horse guards, and regiments of horse reduced, and the superannuated men of the horse guards ————— 4,959

To the reduced officers of the land forces and marines ————— 34,368

For the pensions of widows of ditto, married before December 25, 1716 ————— 2,128

To the King of Prussia, pursuant to the convention ————— 670,000

To the landgrave of Hesse Cassel, pursuant to treaty ————— 50,000

To defray the like sum, raised last session, and charged upon the first aids ————— 600,000

For the civil establishment of Georgia, from Jan 24, 1752, to June 24, 1759	4,252
To make good the deficiency of the additional duty on licences for retailing wine, the duty on goods exported, &c. on the 5th of July 1758	24,371
To make good the deficiency of the duty on glass and spirituous liquors	8,882
For supporting the British forts on the coast of Africa	10,000
To Roger Long, D. D. Lowndes's astronomical and geometrical professor at Cambridge, for discharging a mortgage upon an estate devised by Thomas Lowndes, Esq; (inventor of a method for meliorating brine salt) for the endowment of the said professorship, and other expences of the said Dr. Long	1,280
For paying and clothing the militia in the 5th of March 1760	20,000
For the extra expences of the land forces, 16th Jan 1763, not provided for	466,886
For fortifying Chatham dock	7,000
For fortifying Portsmouth town	15,000
For fortifying Plymouth dock	15,000
For fortifying Milford haven	15,000
For building, rebuilding, and repairing his Majesty's ships	1,000,000
For the out-pensioners of Charles Hospital	1,000,000
For widening and enlarging the passage of the River of the British power and mind	1,000,000
To the Foundling hospital	1,000,000
For transport services and victualling the land forces	1,000,000
For supporting the colony of Nova Scotia, 1757	1,000,000
For defraying the charges of supporting him in 1757	1,000,000

Such was the implicit confidence of the representatives, and of the whole people in our honourable, whose integrity and zeal for his country's welfare they did not doubt; and of whose spirit and abilities for humbling the enemy they had already seen such examples, that they could not but rely on his known honesty and vigilance towards the British power and interest. A conduct,

Their
faith in his Majesty's
councils.

For paying the debts upon the estate forfeited to the Crown by the attainder of Lord John Drummond To the East India company for defending their settlements
To the provinces in North America, for the ex-pences of troops raised by them
To the innholders on which the Hessian troops were billeted in 1758
For augmenting the salaries of the judges in Great Britain
To the widow of Nicholas Hardinge, Esq; for the balance of an account for printing the journals
of the House of Commons
For the interest for money laid out to purchase lands
about Chatham, Portsmouth, and Plymouth
For purchasing lands about ditto
To defray any extra expence of the war in 1759

Total

To the puisne judges of the King's Bench, and all of the Common Pleas 300l. each; the chief baron of the Exchequer 1000l. the rest of the barons 500l. To the judges in Scotland, and the president of the court of Session; and chief baron of the Exchequer 300l. each; and to the other judges of the courts 200l. each. To the justices of Chester and Wales, viz. the chief justice of Chester 200l. and to each of the justices of the Great Session in Wales 150l.

A. D.
1758,

not supported by faction, but roused by the minister's intrepidity, firmness, and vigilance, to revenge the national injuries upon a perfidious enemy.

The Commons
thanks to Admiral
Osborne,
and his answer.

The House of Commons did further express their approbation of the measures pursued against France, by ordering their thanks, by the Speaker,

The Right Honourable the Speaker acquainted the House, that in obedience to their commands, he had signified to Admiral Osborne their thanks, and had received the following answer :

S I R,

I want words to express my sense of the honour the House of Commons have been pleased to confer upon me, and only hope that you, Sir, will be as gracious to me in representing my gratitude to that august assembly, as you have been in acquainting me with their favourable acceptance of my services. I have done no more than my duty. I have only been the humble, though happy, instrument of executing the wise measures directed by his Majesty.

I have no title, Sir, to any glory, but what is common to me as a seaman, and as an Englishman zealous for the service of my country, which is pleased to reward me with this instance of their approbation. From the situation of my health, Sir, I can flatter myself with having but few opportunities of employing the remainder of my life, in a grateful exertion of my abilities for the honour and interest of my country. But as the House of Commons is so gloriously watchful to encourage the greatest merit, by rewarding the least, England can never want good officers; and however honoured I am by this distinction, may my services be the most inconsiderable, that shall be thus acknowledged. I am, with the greatest respect,

S I R,

Your most obedient, and

most humble servant,

HENRY OSBORNE

Dec. 8, 1758.

A.D. 1758.

not supported by faction, but raised by the ministers' integrity, firmness, and vigilance, to revenge the national injuries upon a perfidious
enemy.

The House of Commons did further express their approbation of the measures pursued against France by ordering their thanks, by the speaker,

The Commons
thanks to Admiral
Osborne
and his
council

The Right Honourable the Speaker acquainted the House that in obedience to their commands, he had signed to Admiral Osborne their thanks, and had received the following answer.

SIR,

I want words to express my sense of the honour the House of Commons have been pleased to confer upon me, and only hope that you will be as generous to me in representing my gratitude to that illustrious body, as you have been to distinguish me with their honours, and expressions of my services.
I have been so much honoured, that I have only seen the humble, though happy, instance of exceeding the merit
lives deserve to be rewarded.
I have no other wish, but to be able to do what is necessary to me as a reward, and in doing so, to be able to do what is necessary of my country, and in doing so, to be able to do what is necessary of their approbation. From the sanction of my brethren, and can I have more to say, than to say that I have been so much
ing the remainder of my life, and in doing so, to be able to do lines for the honour and service of my country. But as the House of Commons, in doing so, to be able to do what is necessary greater merit, and in doing so, to be able to do what is necessary good officers, and in doing so, to be able to do what is necessary may my services be the most considerable, that shall be thus acknowledged, I am, with the greatest respect,

Your most obedient and
most humble servant,

Dec. 8. 1758.
HENRY OSBORNE

A.D. 1758

to Admiral Osborn for his vigilance and service in the Mediterranean, whereby the enemy was deprived of the service of one half of their naval force, and of the means to relieve Loughbourg, &c. And To Admiral Boscawen, returned from the conduct of Loughbourg, having taken his seat in the house (on the 21st) the speaker, pursuant to an order of the Commons, gave him their thanks in those words, "For the service he has done to the nation."

that
of the
in never

to the
in you
of this

in the
of the
the

The Hon.^{ble} EDWARD BOSCAWEN, Admiral
of the Blue Squadron.

of which has already been said in the former and uniform tone and language of every part of the kingdom.

Their

to Admiral Osborne, for his vigilance and service in the Mediterranean, whereby the enemy was deprived of the service of one half of their naval force, and of the means to relieve Louisbourg, &c. And Admiral Boscawen, returned from the conquest of Louisbourg, having taken his seat in the house, (on the 12th) the Speaker, pursuant to an order of the Commons on the 6th, gave him their thanks as he stood in his place, in these words, with an air of great dignity, suitable to the importance of the subject, and to the assembly in which it was spoken.

A. D.
1758.

To Admiral
Boscawen,

Admiral Boscawen,

THE house have unanimously resolved, that thanks should be given to you for the services you have done to your King and country in North America; and it is my duty to convey their thanks to you.

I wish I could do it in a manner suitable to the occasion, and as they ought to be given to you, notwithstanding in your place, and number of this house.

But were I able to enumerate and set forth, in the best manner, the great and extensive advantages accruing to this nation from the conquest of Louisbourg, with the islands of Cape Breton and St. John, I could only exhibit a repetition of what has already been, and is, the genuine and uniform sense and language of every part of the kingdom.

Their

THE GENERAL HISTORY OF

Their joy too has been equal to their sentiments upon this interesting event; and in their sentiments and joy they have carried their gratitude also to you, Sir, as a principal instrument in these most important acquisitions.

You are now therefore receiving the acknowledgments of the people, only in a more solemn way—by the voice, the general voice, of their representatives in parliament:—a more honourable acknowledgment than can be given at, in this, or any other country. It is, on these occasions, a national honour, from a free people; ever cautiously to be conferred, in order to be the more esteemed—to be the greater reward; and which ought to be reserved for the most signal services to the state, and the most approved merit in them: such as this house has usually, and very lately, made their objects of public thanks.

The use, I am persuaded, you will make of this just testimony, and high reward of your services and merit, will be the preserving in your own mind a lasting impression of what the Commons of Great Britain are now rendering to you, and in a constant continuance of the zeal and ardour for the glory of your King and country, which have made you so deserve it.

In obedience to the commands of the House, I do, with great pleasure to myself, give you the thanks of the house, for the services you have done to your King and country in North America.

Upon

Upon which Admiral Boscawen said

Mr. Speaker,

I am happy in having been able to do my duty but have not words to express my sense of the distinguishing reward that has been conferred upon me by this house: nor can I enough thank you, Sir, for the polite and elegant manner, in which you have been pleased to convey to me the resolution of the house.

Admiral Boscaw-
son's advice.

1782
A.D.
1782

THE LATE WAR
OF THE REVOLUTION

I am happy in having been able to do my British Majesty and the King of Prussia
and France. France offered to sell America, by Sir
by Colonel Clive in Bengal, and their fleet by Admiral Don Juan de Austria, who was defeated

GENERAL HISTORY

the American Revolution has been conducted the British Majesty and the King of Prussia
and France. France offered to sell America, by Sir
by Colonel Clive in Bengal, and their fleet by Admiral Don Juan de Austria, who was defeated

LATE WAR

forage, hospitals, and other conveniences of a pan; the subsidy was paid to Prussia, answered
under the same conditions as had been stipulated by last year's treaty, and the army, under Prince

BOOK IV

Continuing the progress of the war between the allies and Prussia, and between the grand confederates and the King of Prussia. The battles of Barren and Minden, by Prince Ferdinand. The battles of Zellwiese and of Cammerdorf, by the Prussians.

The various success of the Imperialists, Austrians,
and Prussians in Saxony, Silesia, Lusatia, &c.

The measures of the British councils, and the success of their arms, in the West Indies and North America. The conquest of Guadaloupe. The battle and surrender of Quebec, and conquest of Canada.

Tromadoro, Crown-Point, and Niagara. A French invasion defeated by our operations on the coast of France, and the destruction of their fleet from Toulon, by Admiral Boscawen off Lagos, and from Brest, by Admiral Hawke off Belleisle. The operations

war

the French
only by the French
the French

men of the East Indies. The surrender of Surat, the treachery of the Dutch. The French defeated by Colonel Clive in Bengal, and their fleet by Admiral Pocock. Peace offered to their enemies, by his Britannic Majesty and the King of Prussia.

THE parliament having granted almost two millions for the sole purpose of carrying on the war in Germany, exclusive of the extraordinary expence of transporting and recruiting our national troops, in actual service upon that part of the continent; of the train of artillery, convoys, forage, hospitals, and other contingencies of a campaign; the subsidy was paid to Prussia, renewed under the same conditions, as had been stipulated by last year's treaty; and the army, under Prince Ferdinand, was strengthened by fresh reinforcements from England, augmented with German recruits, and supplied with every necessary and convenience required to enable, and to encourage them to face their enemies. But the French, by an act of perfidy, on which they never boggle, when it is to their advantage to break their faith, had cut his Highness off from some resources, which deprived him of many benefits for the opening of the campaign, and facilitated their own operations.

This was the surprize of the neutral Imperial city of Frankfort. Without which the chain of communication, established by the Austrian confederates, at the close of the last campaign, could not have answered the intention of the French operations.

A. D. 1759

France
discovered to surprise treachery
medi

Frankfort
surprized
treacherously by
the French.

A. D.
1759

operations against the army of the elector, Prince Ferdinand. The city received a plentiful supply of provisions, and a supply of every necessary for their army by the count of the Upper Rhine and the count, from Mentz, Spire, Worms, and Alliance.

In what manner

The method the French took to gain this important post, was first a demand of free passage only for the regiment of Flanders, which was granted on condition of being allowed through the city by a detachment of its guards, under the promise and good faith of observing strict discipline, and of committing no act against the authority, and the franchises. But when this French regiment had penetrated no far as the gate of Schwanstun, the obsequious traitors were falling down on their knees, and offering their hands, and in the midst of the surprise and confusion of the citizens, they were immediately supported by five more French regiments, who filled up the city, and then established the best quarters for their General, Prince de Soubise, near the 28 of January, 1759.

Prince Ferdinand resolves to dislodge them.

Prince Ferdinand soon felt the stress of this situation of his army, and was convinced of the necessity to open the campaign with measures to dislodge the French from Frankfurt. But was retarded, till the month of April, by an invasion of the Imperials into Hesse, about the end of February, against whom he was obliged to detach a considerable party of his army, under General Uff, who was ordered to attack at Bamberg, and to march towards Vacha: Unkenhausen executed his orders with such success, that he surprised the enemy in their quarters in the night, between the 1st and 2d of March, took some of them, and obliged the rest to retire, and to evacuate Vacha, Hirschfeld, and all the Hessian bellwicks, which laid the foundation of several skirmishes in this quarter. The Austrians, supported by a strong corps of French from Frankfort, returned and drove the Hanoverians out of their acquisitions: and this united force was, on the 31st of the same month, surprised once more, and severely handled by the Hereditary Prince of Brunswick, who led a considerable body of troops through ways deemed impassable, and killed and made prisoners a battalion of Wurtemburghers, a regiment of cuirassiers at Melrichstadt, besides two battalions of grenadiers, belonging to the Elector of Cologne, and some light troops, with a considerable magazine at Memingen; and a battalion at Wafungen, after a smart encounter with, and the defeat of, General d'Arberg, detached with a strong corps of Austrians to its relief. In the mean time, the Duke of Holstein succeeded in driving the French from Freyensteinau, where a captain and his company were made prisoners of war; which struck such a terror upon the enemy's scattered parties, in those quarters, that they all fell back towards Bamberg.

A.D.
1759.

Frederick having succeeded in these previous operations, and provided a corps of 11 or 12,000 men, to guard Hanover, Hesse, and parts

THE GENERAL HISTORY OF

ACDA 1735

The battle
of Bergen.

The battle
of Bergen.

advised from a surprise, he marched on the 10th of April, with about 30,000 men, drawn from the Lippe and from Hildesheim. His design against Franckfort was to prevent the French reinforcement from arriving in that city. But the M. Duke de Saxe being apprised of Prince Ferdinand's motions, and of the route of the army under his command, penetrated into his intention, and seized (on the 11th) upon the strong post near Bergen, a village which lies between Franckfort and Hamman, and must be forced before the allied army could have advanced to Franckfort.
Accordingly, on the 13th, his Serene Highness meeting with this unexpected obstruction, did not hesitate a moment, but being arrived at nine in the morning facing the enemy, drawn up in order of battle, to receive them, he made his disposition
behind a rising ground, that covered his troops, from whence they sallied about ten o'clock, and the grenadiers of the advanced guard immediately began the attack upon the village of Bergen, with great impetuosity; in which were pushed eight German battalions, supported by several brigades of French foot, placed behind that village. They were received with a very little fire from the troops; and though they were supported by several battalions, under Prince Ysenburg, who did all that an able and valiant General could do, he was composed of all the Hessian cavalry and infantry, of all the Brunswick battalions, six regiments of Prussian foot, three regiments of English foot, and some other regiments of Hessian foot.

fall in the action, and his troops being overpowered, were obliged to retreat in some disorder. However, they rallied again, and made three attacks in the space of two hours and a half, but were not able to carry their point. It was now the chief consideration of the Prince how to retreat with honour and with safety, in the sight of a superior enemy. This could not be done by main force. Stratagem was to supply the want of strength. The day was not half spent. Night was the only means to cover the retreat. His Serene Highness, in this embarrassment, put on an air of resolution to renew the battle with greater vigour. After remaining some time behind the rising ground, that covered the dispositions of the allied army in the morning, he made a shew of another attempt, by separating his infantry into two bodies, one on the right, and another on the left, and placed his cavalry in the center, with a small column of infantry before it. This carried the appearance of an intention to attack both the village of Bergen, which made the right of Beoglio's army, and secured his flanks and center, and to attack the wood on his left, where the whole body of Saxons were stationed; and, if either of these attacks should succeed, to fall directly upon his center. But, though Prince Ferdinand carried this countenance of continuing the attack, and brought up a great number of cannon, with which they kept a brisk cannonade against the village, and also against the wood, where the volunteers were posted, nothing more was at-

A. D.
1759

Overpowered,

Retreats in good order,

by a stratagem.

THE GENERAL HISTORY OF

A. D.
1759.

Loss on both sides.

Prince Ferdinand's conduct applauded.

Franckfort remains in the hands
of the French.

Operations
of the French.

...to his right horse, the troops of the
...the whole day, but to gain time by
...the French general, the night came on,
when the allies fell back to Witten without molestation, with the loss of Prince Yembaun, General Giloe, Count Schulembourg, and about 2000 men, with five pieces of cannon left in the village. The French acknowledge their loss to be considerable.

The conduct of Prince Ferdinand, in this action, deserves the highest commendation, though he was worried. For his honour is greatly enhanced by the skill with which he planned and executed his retreat. However, the effects of this battle were greatly in favour of our enemies, and ruinous to the allies. The French still kept Franckfort, with all the advantages of its situation, and were put into a condition to renew their operations, with greater hopes of success against the territories of the allies, but Prince Ferdinand was reduced to the necessity of remaining upon the defensive, of submitting to many inconveniences, and of encountering many difficulties, for a considerable time, upon the Weser, which river his Serene Highness maintained, in defiance of the several attempts of the French to deprive him of that communication.

Nothing could now prevent the reinforcements of the French armies, on the Upper and Lower Rhine. So that, about the middle of May, they were ready to take the field, and, on the 2d of June, they joined near Marpourg, under the chief command of M. de Contades, who took up his head-quarters at Corbach; and Castell opened her gates

gates to his light horse, the troops of the Land-grave under General Imhoff having retired from that city to Paderborn. All their motions indicated a resolution to cut off Prince Ferdinand's retreat to the Weser, but without effect. The Prince's endeavours were to throw as many obstructions as possible in their way. He left garrisons in Lipsadt, Ritberg, Munster, and Minden.
But they could not divert Contades from his principal object. He marched and encamped on the 12th at Stadtberg; and he detached Broglie to seize upon Munden and Gottingen in Hanover.
Prince Ferdinand moved no further than to Lip-sadt, and encamped between Soest and Werle.
From thence he proceeded, with his army, to the heights of Buren, and to Ritberg; on the 30th of June arrived at Marienfeld; and on the 3d of July he encamped at Driesen, between Osnaburg and Minden; where he was joined by General Wangenheim, and the Hanoverians, whom he brought off from the strong camp at Dulmen, and afterwards from under the cannon of Munster. With this reinforcement Prince Ferdinand made several other motions, till he fixed his head-quarters in an advantageous camp near Petershagen. The French, in the mean time, were left to pursue their plan without opposition; whereby they found means to surprise Ritberg. M. Duke de Broglie took Minden by assault, and made there 1500
men prisoners, and took immense magazines.
Mons. de Armentiers attempted the like against Munster, but was obliged to besiege it in form.
before

A. D.
1759

How
watched by Prince Ferdinand

Successful
of the French.

A.D. 1759. before he would face the garrison of 1700 men, he surrendered prisoner of war, and left the main body of the French army behind, and took an Encamp near Minden.

The allies at Peter-shagen.

advantageous camp near Minden.

We have the allied army, under Prince Ferdinand, at Petershagen, and the main body of the French army near Minden; all the take a view of this campaign in the other parts of Germany.

The strength of the confederate armies against Prussia.

The Austrian confederacy threatened to surround and attack the King of Prussia, with four hundred thousand men; for which immense magazines of provisions, forage, and military stores of all sorts were formed, particularly in Poland by the Russians; on whose operations, in concert with Count Daun, it was apparent the success of their next campaign chiefly depended.

Measures to stop the Russians.

The obstruction of the Russians became the primary object of his attention. He had not strength enough to detach a sufficient force to watch their motions, and to give them battle with any hopes of advantage. His measures must be schemed to deprive them of the power of action.

Destroys their magazines in Poland.

Nothing could effect this grand project, but to cut off their means of subsisting; which depended, not upon the produce of the country or territories, through which they were to march, and already, in a great measure, ruined and laid waste by their last year's barbarities; but upon the magazines erected for their particular use in Poland. Here he resolved to make feel the full blow of his arms in 1759, and to cut them off, if possible; and for this purpose he detached forty squadrons and

and twenty-five battalions under General Wober-nowy, from Glogau in Silesia, about the middle of February, who entered Poland, destroyed feveral vast magazines belonging to the Russians, and particularly that at Pomm, guarded by 2000 Cossacks, and contained as much flour as might have fed 30,000 men for three months. In some accounts say, 40,000 bushels of grain.

His next endeavours were to disconcert the intended union of the Imperialists and French with the Austrians; and then to attack the latter with advantage. This scheme so far succeeded, that he drove the Imperialists from their stations at Erfurt, Gotha, and Eisenach; and then to burn and destroy their magazines also: which service was well executed by General Knobloch, with a detachment from the Prussian army in Saxony, about the latter end of February; who carried off the forage and provisions to Saxe-Naumberg, and had that part of the country under heavy contributions.

Detaches a strong body against the Imperialists.

The
In this expedition the Prussians attacked the castle of Breslau, a Polish grandee, who had interested himself against the King of Prussia, forced him to surrender, and carried him and his garrison prisoners into Silesia; and loaded 100 waggon with provisions and forage; he had collected for General Knobloch was detached from Saxony to Erfurt, of which he made himself master on February the 10th. General Guder, after surrendering that city by capitulation, retired to Weimar, with the four battalions, which he commanded. Two other battalions threw themselves into the fortress of Petersburg, and promised to stand longer. The evening

ADP 1760Other detachments.

The troops of his Prussian Majesty had been where inactive on the coast, and had gained side of Mecklenburg, attacked Schwerin, and the principal cities in that duchy, from whence they drove a garrison of 2000 men to seek shelter

on a small island in the Lake of Schwerin. The lives of the young men in the town were bear arms, to enlist in the Prussian service, and laid the country under contributions. From thence this corps penetrated into Swedish Pomerania, and forced the garrison of 200 men and eleven officers, in the town of Penzance, to surrender prisoners

of war.

Advantages over
the Swedes

The Swedes were not below his criticism; nor did the severity of the winter prevent his pursuit of their flying army. For the army under General Mantuffel, in Pomerania, acted with such spirit, that his labours were recompensed with the surrender of Damgarten, Wolgast, and several other places, whose garrisons either melted in time, or immediately submitted to the Prussian commander, and he reduced Demen and Anklam by siege, at evening before, he had taken, near Reruth, three officers, and sixty men. The 2d of March M. de Kleit, lieutenant-colonel of the green hussars, passed as far as Blumhagen, where he made 124 prisoners. A detachment sent to Sankelahn, and Vahl, took also 120 men. On the 11th, Lieutenant-colonel Wismar, with 100 men, attacked a body of grenadiers posted behind felled trees, near Prauenwerde, and drove them from the post.

took twenty-seven prisoners, and one piece of cannon, a drum,
and a bag of powder.

After this success, the Prussian army, under General Bommitz, one column, was sent to the town of and another, under General Mantuffel, by Reruth, to
the

the first time made 8000 prisoners of war, including officers, 48 pieces of cannon, mortars and howitzers, a large quantity of ammunition in Danzig, and a very considerable magazine in Alstern.

A. D. 1759
O. P. 1759
O. P. 1759

There remained but one more attempt, which, if executed with success, would complete his plan, and place him in a condition to march in quest of the main Austrian army. This was, to cut off, or to strengthen the subsistence of M. Daun's army, as much as possible. With this view we see his Majesty, immediately upon advice of the promised success of his different parties, assembling his main army near Stungau, and entrenching his forces at Bolchenhayn, near Landshut in Silesia. By which disposition he both rendered the invasion of Silesia impracticable, cut off the subsistence of M. Daun's army from that quarter, and even from Moravia, on which great dependence had been placed by the enemy, and enabled his brother, Prince Henry, to march out of Saxony into Bohemia, about the middle of April, and by destroying the Austrian magazines in that kingdom, to render subsistence on that side also extremely difficult. All which was performed without any other loss than at Griefenberg, on the frontiers of Silesia, where a battalion of Prussian grenadiers, posted under Colonel Düring, were surprised and made prisoners by General Heck, who attacked that post with 4000 men. Prince Henry marched in two columns for Bohemia; one column marched by Peterwald, and another, under General Prüssen, by Palsberg and Against Count. Daun.

March 1759
April 1759
May 1759

Prince Henry marches into Bohemia.

THE GENERAL HISTORY OF

Destroys
the Austrian magazines.

and, having passed over the Elbe, the Prussian vanguard, which consisted of three officers and 100 men, found the village of Auffig fortified with a redoubt, and a strong barricade, guarded by 600 Croats and some Hungarian foot. This place was forced: a major and 50 men were made prisoners, and fifteen slain. The time required to remove the barricade, facilitated the retreat of the enemy, who had leisure to draw off their troops. Nevertheless, the Prussian vanguard dividing into two bodies, one proceeded to Auffig, and the other to Toplitz: the enemy fled precipitately every where. The magazine of Auffig was destroyed, and the boats on the Elbe burnt. The vanguard returned, on the 16th, to the main body at Weimar, having seized the magazines at Lowowitz and Leutenberg, and demolished a bridge they had lately built. General Hullen found the pass of Palsberg guarded by a body of Croats, and the regiment of Koenig and Anslau. The horse which marched by Palsberg, attacked the enemy in the rear, while they were attacked in front by the foot, who at length drove them from their entrenchments. General Renard, with fifty-one officers and 2000 men, were taken, and three colours, two standards, and three pieces of cannon. Major-General Ackerlinden, at the head of the vanguard of the column commanded by General Hullen, was detached to Saatz, but the Austrians burnt the magazine in that place, rather than suffer it to fall into the hands of the enemy. General Malinck with the regiment of dragons, and Colonel Kleist, at the head of the hussars, hussars, formed a passage over the Elbe, cut part of the guard to pieces, took three officers, and 120 men prisoners, and destroyed several magazines.

After this expedition of destruction, which filled Bohemia with consternation, Prince Henry returned to refresh his troops near Dresden. But their recess was only of a short duration, for in a few days they were ordered to march in two columns; one took the route of Saalfeldt, the other to Hofs in Franconia: a motion concerted between the King of Prussia and Prince Ferdinand, to disconcert the operations of the Imperialists. For about the same time that Prince Henry set off, with 40,000 men, a detachment of 12,000 Hanoverians, under the command of the Hereditary Prince of Brunswick, began to march from the allied army for the same quarter; and, having joined the Prussians, their united force, on the 8th of April, fell upon the army of the Empire in three different posts, and completed their destruction so effectually, that the Prince of Deux Ponts, their commander in chief, demanded suc-

Routs the Imperial
army.

The total destruction in the magazines amounted to 37,400 tons of meal; 37,400 loaves of bread, of 4 lb. weight each; 6,300 bushel measures of oats, and 25,900 rationes of hay, of 25 lb. weight each. In destroying the magazines at Budin the flames spread, and reduced the town to ashes; though Prince Henry did all in his power to extinguish the fire.

The contributions raised in this expedition were divided: to every field officer 100 rixdollars, to every subaltern 50 rixdollars, to every sergeant 20 rixdollars, and to every private 10 rixdollars. The contributions of all their plunder, arms, accoutrements, and Colonel Kiehl, at the head of the hussars.

Obliged to return into Saxony.

Advantaged himself.

cours from M. Duke de Broglie, the French general at Frankfort. For, General Matignon was forced to quit Aken, and retire in the night to Egwe, and the main body of the army of the Empire not in a condition to dispute the field with the Prussian general, fled before him to Culmbach, thence to Bamberg, and again to Nuremberg. Prince Henry, in this pursuit, reduced

Cronach and the castle of Rotenberg. But when he had advanced as far as Bamberg, he was recalled, and the Imperial army was delivered from its future motions, by a diversion made by the irruption of a body of Austrians, under General Gemmingen, into Saxony. So that Prince Henry returned into Saxony, after he had made fifteen hundred prisoners, whom he sent to Leipzig, destroyed all the magazines that fell in his way, and held the marquisate of Culmbach and the bishoprick of Bamberg under contribution. Though this diversion may be said to save the army of the Empire, their losses sustained by this expedition disabled them from attempting any thing against the Prussians. Indeed Count Palfy made a faint at Bamberg surrendered on terms, at his approach. This confusion happening before the capitulation was completed, a party of Croats fired upon a party of Prussians, who had advanced near one of the gates: which being noticed by the Prince, as a breach of the capitulation, his Highness gave the city up to be plundered by his troops: who pillaged during several days, in a most marauding and licentious manner, which occasioned loud complaints, all over Europe, the Prussians, and afterwards produced a severe reclamation. But the necessity counts from M. Duke de Broglie, the French general, to have their retreat with a party of Imperialists, but that body was defeated with a considerable slaughter near Hofs, which reduced their whole army to about 10,000 men, who returned to Bamberg, and Gemmingen having gained his point, to draw the Prussian army back into Saxony, he retired into Bohemia at the approach of Prince Henry.

M. Count Daun was all this time encamped in a very advantageous post, with the grand Austrian army at Scharitz in Bohemia; within the circle of Koninggratz. His right was at Braunau, and the left extended to Gabel. The King of Prussia remained near Landsbut, and a considerable body of Prussians, commanded by General Fouquet, were posted in the southern part of Silesia. Which disposition kept their enemies in awe, and at short allowance for provisions and forage, though there were several skirmishes between Fouquet and the Austrian General de Ville, who commanded a large body of troops on the frontiers of Moravia. Here we behold the King of Prussia and M. Daun, watching each other, with the greatest attention and impatience, to seize a critical moment, that might happen through any incident or oversight in either party. The Prussian Majesty had done all that could be done in his circumstances, to distress his enemies, and to oblige them to remain upon the defensive. Nor could his enemies dare to attack him, without the assistance of the Russians. They had suffered greatly by the destruction of their magazines in the winter. But the necessity of being to Position of Count Daun.

Of the King of Prussia.

Russians
their operations.

of the troops destined to act against the invaders. With which he encamped near Custrin; and he was afterwards reinforced by the several bodies of troops under General Hullen and General Werbenow, with orders to march into Poland in quest of the enemy.

A.D. 1769

Count Dohna advanced to Merx in Poland, and published a manifesto in the name of his Prussian Majesty, (dated the 15th of June) setting forth the necessity he was under to enter the republic of Poland, with a part of his armies, in order to protect their territories against the threatened invasion of the enemy; and declaring that this step must not be deemed a breach of respect, he always had for that illustrious republic, nor lessen the good understanding hitherto subsisting between them, but to strengthen the same by granting him the same good-will as the Republic shewed to the enemy, than which he desired nothing more. He then demanded a supply of provisions, corn, and forage sufficient for 40,000 men, with the most dispatch, upon promise of paying ready money for the same, but threatening to take it by force, in the same manner as the enemy had done, in case of a refusal or neglect.

Marches into Poland. Publishes a manifesto to excite this march.

Demands provisions for money.

His Majesty also made an attempt to draw recruits from Poland, and to engage some of the Polish nobility to take up arms in his cause and to join his army. For on the 22d of the same month, another manifesto or proclamation issued from Count Dohna, importing, That if any one had an inclination to enter into the King of Prussia's

A manifesto for recruiting.

THE GENERAL HISTORY 69

A. D.
1739.

Another
against harbouring deserters,

and for punishing deserters.

his service, with an intention to behave well and faithfully, he might apply to the head-quarters, and be assured of a capitulation for three or four years: and that if any Prince or member of the republic of Poland were disposed to assemble a body of men, and to join in a troop, or in a company, the Prussian army, to make a common cause with it, he might depend upon a gracious reception, and that due regard would be shewn to his merit; at the same time threatening disagreeable consequences to any person, that should give shelter, conceal or lodge, any deserter from the Prussian colours, and promising a reward to every person that should bring a deserter back, and deliver him at the first advanced post, or at the head-quarters. A caution that was become exceeding necessary, as appears by another manifesto of the 17th, wherein it is declared, " That it was with " the greatest astonishment that the King had " heard that several of his own subjects had suf" fered themselves to be seduced from their alle" giance so far, as to enter into the service of a
" Potentate with whom he is actually at war:
" and that all his subjects serving in the enemies
" armies, who shall be taken with arms in their " hands, shall be sentenced to be hanged without
" mercy, as traitors to their King and country.
From which it is evident, that the Prussian army in its march into Poland began to suffer by frequent desertions; and that it was necessary to bring the affair intended with the Russians to a crisis.

This

This was certainly the resolution and expectation of the King of Prussia; his own army growing weaker, and in danger of being distressed for provisions; whilst the enemy were in a situation to be daily reinforced and supplied by their fleet, now united with the Swedes, and commanding all the coast of the Baltic, from whence recruits, ammunition, provision, and all sorts of warlike stores, could be easily conveyed to the Russian army.

A.D. 1759

Swedish fleet joins the Russian.

But Count Dohna, diffident of his own strength, though he advanced as far as within five miles of Polesna, could not be prevailed upon to attack the Russian grand army, under General Soltikoff, in their strong encampment: which, having the city of Polesna and the river Warta in their rear, and in their front a formidable entrenchment, mounted with a numerous artillery, he thought it would be impregnable, or at least could not be attacked with any degree of success. Therefore he contented himself with trying every means to harass the enemy, to watch their motions, and to cut off their convoys to the eastward; till such time as his own army was reduced to the necessity of falling back to the Oder for their own subsistence. So that all he could do was not sufficient to stop their progress towards Silles, whither they marched and encamped between Langemeil and Sehmellau; by the time the Prussian General got with his army to Zullichau, near Crossen.

Count Dohna's overcaution.

This battle was had instructions to seize all Prussian vessels coming from, or bound into Berlin.

Disagreeable to his Prussian Majesty.

Superseded,

by General Wedel.

Who prepares to attack the Russian
camp.

To dispute
the passage
of the Oder.

This conduct of Count Dohna was extremely disagreeable to his Prussian Majesty, who placed great confidence in the courage of his troops, in the skill of his commanders, and in the cowardice of his enemies; whose pikemen and advanced guards, at the approach of only five battalions of Russian infantry, supported by a few squadrons of horse, retreated within their lines, and General Mänterforn, with that gallant corps, reconnoitred the situation of their camp, and to ours of seven prisoners, without the least notice to cut off his retreat. Therefore his Majesty super- seded this cautious general by the appointment of General Wedel to his command in chief, with positive orders to attack the Russian Army, which consisted of 70,000 men, though the Prussian forces did not exceed 20,000.

General Wedel arrived at the Prussian camp at Züllichau on the 22d of July, escorted by 200 dragoons, commanded by Major Podewils; who in his march defeated a Russian detachment plun- dering the village of Radwitz, killed 60, and took 80 prisoners. General Wedel immediately re- connoitred, in person, the position of the enemy's camp, which was still at Langemün. But next morning, he discovered by their motions, that the Russians were preparing to quit their intrench- ments, and to draw nearer the Oder, which af- wards appeared to favour M. Dohna's motions against the King. So that General Wedel set off with all possible diligence, to dispute the pas- sage of that river. For this purpose, he sent his army in two columns, one to march towards Kay, the other towards Moze.

THE LATE WAR.

These motions soon brought on an engagement for the van-guard of the column, that took the route of Kay, and consisted of cavalry, had scarce passed the denie of Kay, before they fell in with the enemy's light troops, which they repulsed with great loss. Skirmishes happened every where in favour of the Prussians: and General Schorlemmer's cavalry did great execution at different times in their march. Lieutenant General Mantouill, with six battalions, drove the enemy from several batteries, which the Russians had erected upon the heights to cover them as they advanced. But the fire from those heights was so well served, and continued with such briskness, and the Prussians having the worst of the ground, and not being able to bring their artillery to bear upon their enemies, that General Wedel was obliged to desist from the charge.

The Russians and their confederates greatly magnified this action to their own advantage. But when we consider that the Russians did not pursue Wacker's army, and let him quietly sit down and pitch his camp within cannon-shot of their own, and with his right wing extending to the hill of Kay, where the action began; they could have no reason to boast of the success of the day. And though the Prussians lost 4000 killed, prisoners, and wounded, the Russians loss was considerably more. But the greatest loss of the Prussians was in the death of General Wobbenow, who was killed in attacking a battery. There were 6000 wounded, amongst whom was General Mantoufelle.

A. D.
1759.

The Russians, though not in a humour to renew the battle, and to force the trenches of General Wedel, endeavoured to improve the opportunity, when they were well assured that the Prussians were not in a condition to venture another battle, till strongly reinforced. In this interval Prince Soltikoff quitted his camp, and made himself master of Francfort upon the Oder, and of Crotzen, without opposition.

His Prussian Majesty, who had been obliged to make various motions, to counteract the schemes of M. Daun, endeavouring to draw nearer to the route of the Russians, and to facilitate their operations against Silesia, in order to favour the plan he had formed for all the confederate armies to attack the Prussians at one time, had quitted his camp in the mountains near Landshut, and marched by the way of Herchenberg to Lant. In this route his vanguard met with the Austrians under General Laudohn, who had entered Silesia by the way of Griefenberg, and obliged him to retreat with loss.

His Majesty had his eye chiefly on the motions of the Russians, whose progress was to be stopped at all events: and as all accounts concurred to make their motions daily more dangerous to his Majesty, he was resolved, after the retreat of

Laudohn,

His house

M. Daun's camp

Russians take Francfort on the Oder.

Motions of this year

M. Daun's camp

King of Prussia watches the motions of the Russians.

A.D. 1759

Laudohn, by which Silesia was secured from any immediate attack from the Austrian army, to wait at Geppesdorf, the success of his arms under General Wedel, having for that purpose chosen a strong and advantageous camp on the heights before the village of Schmorheffen, both flanks well covered: its left towards Liebenhel, and Loewenberg behind its right wing. At the same time M. Daun occupied the heights behind the Queiss, extending his right towards Griefenberg, and his left to Lanthan, with his head quarters at Gorklin Heim in Lusatia.

His strong camp.

M. Daun's camp.

The two armies were thus situated, when the news of the action between the Russians and the Prussians arrived in their camps. His Prussian Majesty resolved immediately to march, in person, to revenge the cause of General Wedel, and thereby to defeat the Russians. M. Daun penetrated into this design, and prepared immediately to reinforce the Russians with a strong body of Austrian cavalry, of which they were in need. The King put himself at the head of 10,000 choice troops, and marched for Wedel's army on the 1st of August, leaving the rest of his forces under the command of his brother Henry, to watch M. Daun. M. Daun had already detached about 12,000 horse and 8000 foot, under the command of General Laudohn, in chief. These troops marched in two divisions, one column through Silesia, the other through Lusatia, and would have completed their junction had not General Wedel taken the post of Plauen, opposite to

King of Prussia's resolution to march against the Russians.

M. Daun reinforces the Russians.

Laudohn. G 8 3 Crossen,

THE GENERAL HISTORY OF

A.D. Croffen. By which means his Prussian Majesty came up with the column commanded by General Haddick, at Somerfeldt, who retired at the approach of the Prussians; but not without considerable loss in his rear-guard; and in several skirmishes: in which the Prussians made a large booty and 2000 prisoners. Yet it was not in his Majesty's power to prevent the Austrians joining the Russians before he was in a condition to attack their main army.

The King joins Gen. Wedel.

The King found General Wedel at Croffen, which he had retaken from the Russians: and on the 4th of August, their forces were joined at Muhltroie. But as the Austrian auxiliaries had augmented Soltikoff's army to 90,000, it was judged necessary to put off the intended attack till his Majesty could receive further reinforcement: and his only resource on this occasion was to recall the 3000 men detached under General Finck, to cover Saxony in his absence. Finck joined his Majesty's army on the 8th, at Lebus: and from that moment it was determined to march in quest of the Russians, and to give them battle.

Strength of the Russian army.

The Russians and Austrians together made an army of 90,000 men; and were entrenched between Francfort and Cunnerdorf in an advantageous situation, and defended by an immense artillery. The Prussians did not muster 50,000 men: but the deferring of an action was leaving the enemy at liberty to overrun and pillage the best and richest part of his dominions; was giving up Saxony a prey to the Imperials, who

Of the Prussians.

Motives for fighting.

By which means his Prussian Majesty's army was enabled to come up with the Russian army, and to attack it on its flank. The Russian army was not without some success in the first attack, but it was not sufficient to prevent the Prussian army from attacking it on its flank. The Russian army was not without some success in the first attack, but it was not sufficient to prevent the Prussian army from attacking it on its flank.

Differences in such a case were to be disregarded. Danger was to be braved. On the 11th the Prussian army passed the Oder near Cultrin, and formed in order of battle near Escher, pursuing its march to Bischoffsee. General Finck was charged with the corps of reserve; with which he took post on the eminences between that place and Tretin.

Prussian order of battle.

The 12th was the decisive day. The army began to march towards Repin at two in the morning, halted and formed in a wood, and then advanced towards the Russians. The left wing was kept back. The van-guard gained an eminence opposite to the enemy's left, on which the King ordered several batteries to be erected, intending to make his greatest effort on that side. It was at a'clock before his Majesty could bring matters to bear for the onset; when unmasking his batteries, there began a most furious fire upon the centre of the Russian left, and upon its right point, with success; and, as soon as he perceived the disorder of the enemy, occasioned by the cannonade, his Majesty ordered some battalions in columns, to fall upon the left point, and the flank of the left wing. The charge was made with such impetuosity, that the Russians were staggered.

Battle begun.

THE GENERAL HISTORY OF

conditions with the enemy. For it was not In Mainz would bear no opposition to his opinion. It was resolved, the attack was made. The Austrian general came, with the lion, and beat the Prussian back, which was the first step of the plan. The king and his army to arrive the other side, he himself led on his troops to the charge, and engaged in person to the greatest danger. He had two horses killed under him, and several balls passed through his clothes. But all these efforts were in vain. His troops were spent. The post was inaccessible; and some of the enemy's cannon were brought within 40 yards, and fired with carnage. Therefore, perceiving that his men were exhausted, and that he had been deceived in his opinion of the enemy's strength and courage, he came to the resolution to draw them off: in which he was favoured by the approach of night: for that enabled him to get possession of some heights, which could be easily defended; and by that means he covered the retreat of his troops, who were obliged to return to the place where they began the attack, and quit all the advantages they had gained in the beginning of the day.

Defeated.

As soon as his Prussian Majesty was convinced of this fatal error, he dispatched another messenger to inform his Queen. That he had learned another attempt in which he had failed, and commanded her to remove from Berlin with the royal family, and to send the archives to Pottsdam. He also gave the city leave to make " conditions

"conditions with the enemy." For it was not known but that the Russians would make the best of their way to plunder the capital of Brandenburg,
and lay the Electorate under heavy contributions.

This was the most bloody battle the King of Prussia had ever fought. He lost almost twenty thousand of his best troops. The enemy's loss was not so great, though it is certain that they had lost upwards of 10,000 men before they retreated to the Jew's burying-ground. But what injured the King most was, the great slaughter amongst his officers, and the loss of his artillery. General Puckhammer was amongst the slain; and scarce an officer escaped without a wound. In this condition his Majesty, next day, retreated over the Oder, collected his fugitives, and saw, with joy and astonishment, the enemy remain inactive and quiet in their camp. He marched thence to Potsdam, a situation that enabled him of all his forts for Berlin; as it enabled him to cover his capital from all incursions of the Russians, and preserve a communication for supplies of provisions, ammunition, and cannon from the royal magazines in that city. Here also his Majesty was reinforced with 3000 men, under the command of General Klotz, whom he recalled from Pomerania.

When the Russians began to move, instead of taking the route for Brandenburg, he marched further into Silesia, with part of his army, joined M.
Bauer's army in Lusatia, and continued with that general in what manner they might best improve
the

A. D.
1759
Loss of
both sides.

Retreats
without molestation.

Retreats
without molesta-
tion.

of the
the
M.
Dau.

THE GENERAL HISTORY OF

the late advantage, the Imperialists having already overrun Saxony, and reduced Halle, Torgau, Torgau, and Dresden. Their resolution was for the Russians to besiege Great Glogau. But this design was frustrated by the penetration of the King, who, foreseeing their intention, detached General Wunck, with six thousand men, to check the progress of the Imperialists in Saxony, and encamped with the rest of his army, so as to cover Glogau from a surprise.

Thus we see four great armies, commanded by the King of Prussia, Prince Henry, Count Daun, and General Solikoff, encamped in Lufcia and the borders of Silesia. They watched the motions of each other, while the war was carried on briskly by detached parties. Wunck, at the head joined General Finck at Eulenburg, and in their route towards Dresden, they frightened General

Haddick from an advantageous post near Roth-Sennberg, and repulsed him, joined by the whole Imperial army near Meissen, on the 21st of September. The Austrians and Imperialists attacked the two Prussian generals in their entrenchments at Coburg, and endeavoured to dislodge them by a furious cannonade from morning to night, under whose favour they retired with a considerable loss in killed and wounded, and 600 prisoners in the hands of the Prussians.

Prince Henry formed a scheme to surprise a considerable body of Austrians under General Kehle, at Horndorff, about eleven German miles distant from his camp at Horndorff, near Goritz;

Robbie
to besiege
Great Glogau.

Armies
and R
and situation
of the
army.

Skirmishes

At Horndorff.

THE GENERAL HISTORY OF

1795
1795

Henry encamps
near Tor-
gen.

Joined by the King.

General
Finck fur-
rounded.

Heavy of his troops.

After this action Prince Henry, encamped with his party, called in at Silesia; from whence on the 10th day of November, he marched to a strong camp near Lomga, to prevent his coming in contact with that city being cut off. Before he was soon joined by the King himself and 20,000 men from Silesia.

The King had conceived a project to hinder the retreat of the Austrians into Bohemia, by gaining possession of the duchies of Meissen and Osnabrück. He detached thirteen battalions and thirty other squadrons, under General Finck, for this service. But there was some rigorous mistake either in the project or in its execution. For though Daun, on advice of this motion, did retire to Pflaen, yet it seems to have been with a design to draw the Prussians more into his power, by making them more off their guard. Finck was therefore encamped on the hill near the village of Meissen, before he saw himself attacked by the corps de reserve of Mr. Daun's army, which was encamped under the command of Baron de Sins.

near Dippoldswalde. The Baron marched his troops in four columns through the woods, and surrounded the Prussians, before they had the least intimation of their approach. However, the courage of General Finck, and the bravery of his troops maintained their ground with great resolution, till they lost their redoubts, and were overpowered.

THE GENERAL HISTORY

SECRET

of land...
the...

Weekend : The House of Representatives passed a bill on Saturday to

Chief of nursing services and planning, Mrs.

felt with the leadership of his former boss, who had almost lost his own mind to

took all possible measures to prevent a further and obtained a reinforcement of 12,000 men; and der ist Hoolivood, Prince of Darkness, fast der einstimmig, aber wenn ich das Ding höre, ist es

There, his Majesty decided that... placed his own trust in what...

the banks of the Elbe, opposite to Mitten, General Dietrich's headquarters, and being recalled, was obliged to transport his troops in boats. The boat was driven to the shore of his

NIGM

END OF THE THIRD VOLUME

of General F. B. ... it is with some ...
If the King of Prussia is culpable for the late ...

Saxony, and outwore the great camp of Philip.

after an action that deprived his Roman Majesty

The 3d of December.

100

3

END OF THE THIRD VOLUME

GENERAL INSTRUCTIONS

The first of these is to be a man of good character and sound judgment. He should be able to give evidence in a clear and concise manner, and
to be able to answer questions
in a straightforward manner.

The second of these is to be a man of good character and sound judgment. He should be able to give evidence in a
clear and concise manner, and
to be able to answer questions
in a straightforward manner.

END OF THE THIRD VOLUME

